BEIRUT, Lebanon — Kidnappers holding American hostages announced five demands for their release Sunday and threatened to make the United States pay a price that "will reflect adversely" on the captives if the demands are not met.

It was the second threatening statement in three days from the pro-Iranian Islamic Jihad, which holds American journalist Terry Anderson and educator Thomas Sutherland.

The three-page typewritten Arabic statement was delivered to the independent newspaper An-Nahar. A color photograph of Anderson was delivered later to a Western news agency in Beirut — the kidnappers' normal method of authenticating statements.

The picture showed Anderson, chief Middle East correspondent for The Associated Press, with a bushy beard and mustache. He wore a T-shirt and looked straight into the camera. It was similar to photographs of Anderson released released April 10, 1987 and on Friday.

Extremists kill 10 in India

NEW DELHI, India — Sikh extremists shot and killed 10 people in Punjab state, including a Communist Party official, police said Sunday.

Also Sunday, a news agency reported that a top Sikh radical had drowned.

Police said one of the victims of the latest Sikh separatist violence was Swaran Singh, a member of the pro-Moscow Communist Party of India.

Singh was fatally shot in his village in Amritsar on Saturday night, police said. The motive for the killing was not known, but Sikh radicals fighting for an independent Sikh nation in Punjab have killed Communist Party members in the state because they are opposed to the Sikh separatist demand.

United News of India reported the drowning of Gurvinder Singh, a top Sikh radical who headed the Gurdaspur district unit of the Babbar Khalsa, one of the groups leading the separatist campaign. The report did now say where or when Singh died, only that the body was identified Sunday.

Hurricane leaves 111 dead

MANAGUA, Nicaragua — Hurricane Joan killed at least 111 people as it ravaged the Caribbean, officials said Sunday. In Nicaragua, authorities labored to restore communications and care for about 300,000 homeless.

The storm left 50 dead in Nicaragua, 21 in Costa Rica, four in Panama, 25 in Colombia, and 11 in Venezuela on its six-day slash along the coast and then across Nicaragua to the Pacific Ocean. More than 150 people were missing.

Joan slowly weakened into a tropical storm over Nicaragua but strengthened again when it reached the Pacific. No longer an Atlantic hurricane, it was given a new name in the sequence of this year's Pacific storms — Tropical Storm Miriam.

At 5 p.m. EDT, Miriam was about 60 miles south-southeast of San Salvador, El Salvador, with maximum sustained winds of about 55 mph, according to the National Hurricane Center in Miami. It said the storm was moving in a westerly-northwest direction at 10 mph.

Hurricane Joan blasted into the east coast Nicaraguan city of Bluefields with 125 mph winds early Saturday and marched across the Iowa-sized country of 3 million, leaving a trail of death and destruction before reaching Managua, the capital, about 10 p.m. Saturday.

Officials said there were 21 dead in Bluefields, 180 miles east of Managua. The city of about 38,000 was reported 90 percent destroyed.

Storm kills 35; 1,500 missing

DHAKA, Bangladesh — Hundreds of fishermen were missing after a severe storm hit the southern coast, killing at least 35 people, officials said Sunday. A boating group said the government failed to broadcast warnings.

The storm lashed cities along the Bay of Bengal with 75 mph winds and 15-foot waves Wednesday, injuring more than 1,000, authorities said.

Newspapers and district officials estimated as many as 1,500 fishermen were missing.

Mohammad Kamal, district official at the sea resort of Cox's Bazar, said Sunday more than 1,000 had been rescued. He said navy boats continued to search the bay.

Ekramul Huda Choudhury, president of the Cox's Bazar Fishing Boat Owners Association, "Loss of life and boats would have been much less if the authorities had warned the fishermen about the impending storm over the radio."

American Royal losing face

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The reputation of the American Royal is going downhill because of its crumbling buildings and stiff competition from a show in Louisville, Ky., according to cattle and horse breeding officials.

They predict that unless city officials move quickly to repair or replace the 66-year-old American Royal Building, one of the nation's premier livestock and horse events for 90 years may become second-rate.

"The American Royal used to be a powerful show, and that has changed," said Jim Harris, vice president and director of special events for the American Polled Hereford Association, headquartered in Kansas City. "We always hear some moaning and groaning about coming here."

Gary Reynold, assistant director of the American Quarter Horse Association in Amarillo, Texas, agrees. "We've started hearing complaints about the Royal from some of our members," he said.

And, Richard Spader, executive vice president of the American Angus Association in St. Joseph, said, "Over the years, there has been less of an emphasis on showing at the Royal."

700 participate in art project

OTTAWA — About 700 people wearing red and blue shirts gathered on a soybean field to be molded into a piece of art by an artist known for his unusual creations.

Stan Herd on Saturday popped the top off his latest land-art creation: a five-acre depiction of two partially crumpled Pepsi and Coca-Cola soda pop cans.

The people provided the color; Herd and his unusual ability to sculpt farm land added the design. The title of the work: "The Ottawa Beanfield Cola War."

"When does a person get a chance to be a part of art?" said Richard Rudzinski, 45, of Wichita, who stood near the bottom of the Pepsi can.

Herd, 38, said one of the messages of the work was a reminder that people need to take better care of the environment — the crumpled cans of pop representing trash thrown on the side of a highway.

"It also was a tongue-in-cheek slap at the way advertising people depict us," he said. "The battle for the consumer dollar ... the Pepsi generation ... commercialization."

Before "Cola Wars," Herd's field art included an Indian chief sculpted on a field near Dodge City, and a vase of sunflowers on a checkered tablecloth plowed on a field near Lawrence.

Historian to deliver lecture

Stephen E. Ambrose, military historian and professor at the University of New Orleans, will deliver the third biennial Dwight D. Eisenhower lecture at 8 tonight in Forum Hall.

"Nixon and Vietnam: Vietnam in Electoral Politics" is Ambrose's topic.

Ambrose earned his bachelor's and doctorate degrees from the University of Wisconsin and his master's from Louisiana State University. He has taught at New Orleans, Johns Hopkins University, the Naval War College, the University College of Dublin, Ireland, and at K-State.

At K-State, Ambrose served as the Dwight D. Eisenhower professor of war and peace until his return to the University of New Orleans in 1970-1971 as the alumni distinguished professor of history.

Ambrose has written many books, including "Nixon: the Education of a Politician," "Eisenhower: Soldier, General of the Army, President Elect," "Eisenhower: the President" and "Rise to Globalism: American Foreign Policy since 1938." He has also written several television documentaries.

Groups to sponsor fund-raiser

The K-State chapters of Phi Eta Sigma and Alpha Lambda Delta, freshman honoraries, will sponsor the sale of used records and tapes from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. today through Wednesday on the first floor of the Union.

Proceeds from the record and tape sales will benefit the Flint Hills Bread Basket. The Manhattan-based organization distributes food to needy members of the community and surrounding area.

The Bread Basket is currently driving for donations to facilitate the purchase and distribution of food supplies for the approaching Thanksgiving holiday. The record and tape sale is a part of this program.

K-State, Riley County not immune to rapes

By Lisa Pfannenstiel
Collegian Reporter

Rape — K-State is not excluded from the crime. Since January, two alleged sexual assaults were recorded by the K-State Police.

In addition, the Riley County Police Department has recorded seven rapes in the county since January. During the previous five years, 42 rapes were recorded.

Although campus police may hear rumors of additional assaults, nothing can be done if the incident isn't reported, said Richard W. Herrman, investigator for the campus police.

"The time of attack is the most crucial time to report the crime," Herrman said.

Although victims may be hesitant about reporting an incident, an immediate investigation reveals fresh evidence and important supporting details.

"Rape is a serious charge. Before a suspect can be charged with rape, the victim must have a credible case," said Bill Kennedy, Riley County Attorney.

Insufficient evidence, he said, is one of the major reasons a case is not prosecuted.

He said rape could be defined as sexual intercourse with a person who does not consent to sexual intercourse under any of four circumstances:

- When the victim is overcome by force or fear.
- When the victim is unconscious or physically powerless.
- When the victim is incapable of giving consent because of mental deficiency or disease, when the condition is known by the offender or is reasonably apparent to the offender.
- When the victim is incapable of giving consent because of the effect of any alcohol, narcotic, drug or other substance administered to the victim by the offender, or by another person with the offender's knowledge, unless the victim voluntarily consumes or allows the administration of the substance with knowledge of its nature.

Sexual intercourse means penetration of the vagina not only by the penis but also by a finger or any object. Any penetration, however slight, constitutes sexual intercourse, Kennedy said.

The first instinct of the victim is to bathe, change clothes and destroy the evidence, he said.

"My wish is that the rape victim go straight to the police or hospital," Kennedy said.

Incidents reported to the police are handled by campus police if the crime occurs on University-operated property. Cases in Riley County are handled by the RCPD, Herrman said.

Crimes occurring on campus fall under the Buckley Amendment, which forbids a university agency from releasing information about a student without written permission from the individual. Student names are removed from any information available to the public.

"We don't know where the victim's mindset is. We try to understand the mental anguish and confusion the woman is going through."

—Richard W. Herrman investigator, K-State Police

"Our first concern is the well-being of the victim," Herrman said.

When police arrive at the scene, they ask if the victim would like a friend or counselor present. The victim can request that a female officer record the assault if the victim is not comfortable with a male officer, Herrman said.

"We don't know where the victim's mindset is. We try to understand the mental anguish and confusion the woman is going through," he said.

The victim is taken to the hospital and evidence is collected from the scene, Herrman said.

Even if the woman does not feel comfortable reporting the incident to the police, she can still have personal evidence collected at Lafene Student Health Center, The Saint Mary Hospital or Memorial Hospital.

Memorial Hospital sees one or two alleged sexual assault victims in a month, said Joyce Kuykendall, registered nurse at Memorial Hospital.

The Saint Mary Hospital also records one or two alleged rapes per month.

Both hospitals follow the same examination procedure.

A social worker is available, as well as the nurses and the physician who make the examination, said Patrice Meier, registered nurse at The Saint Mary Hospital.

Before the exam begins, the hospital must obtain written consent to treat the victim, report the alleged sexual assault and collect evidence.

The woman should bring a change of clothing because the hospital will collect each article of clothing and store it in separate bags. The patient disrobes over a large sheet of paper to collect any evidence that may fall off the clothing. The patient is given a gown to wear.

A nurse will clean under each of the victim's nails for evidence. The patient then lies on an examining table with a sheet of paper placed under the buttocks. The pubic hair is combed and put on the paper. The paper is folded and stored as evidence. Hair from the victim's head is also combed for evidence.

A pelvic examination follows, with tests made inside and outside the vagina.

The final part of the examination is a saliva sample.

As stated in the The Saint Mary Hospital's Policy and Procedures manual, the attending physician may decide to alert the police that an alleged rape has occurred without identifying the victim, if the victim doesn't report the incident herself to the police.

Kansas law does not require that an alleged rape be reported to the police when the victim prefers not to do so. However, with the consent of the alleged rape victim, evidence will be collected and stored in a locked area for 14 days — available should the victim change her mind and decide to report the incident to the police.

Chemical evidence from the vaginal swabs, transfers of pubic hair from the combing samples and photos of the beating or abuse help develop the victim's case. Without evidence, proof of rape is difficult, Kennedy said.

During review of the case, he evaluates the consistency of the victim's testimony, the suspect's testimony and the physical evidence.

A case can be prosecuted if charges have been filed, the suspect has been identified and the case has substantial evidence, he said. There are occasions when information is fabricated or when not enough details are known — including cases recorded in hindsight. The victim has two years to report a case, but little can be done without evidence.

"I can't tell (the victim) that she's going to win," Kennedy said.

He said he can only assess the situation and present the case with the available evidence.

Assault victims receive counseling

By Lisa Pfannenstiel
Collegian Reporter

A rape is reported about once every six minutes in the United States. Nevertheless, reported rapes represent only a fraction of the number that actually occur. Victimization surveys estimate that 10 times as many rapes are committed as are reported. — FBI

The victims of sexual assault should realize services are available to them whether the rape is reported or not, said Judy Davis, director of the Women's Resource Center.

"Sexual assault has been a major concern throughout the ages, but today we are seeing a growing frustration among the victims," said Susan Scott, associate dean of student life.

"University counseling and law enforcement services can't track down the rumors of assaults from this fall or previous semesters," Scott said.

But counselors can offer advice and support to the victims, she said. The woman often needs more assistance than a friend can provide. Many victims go through a stage of denial after the incident, which is followed by emotional and physical symptoms that could take five years to surface, Scott said.

Counselors from the Women's Resource Center, the Crisis Center and the Dean of Student Life are trained to listen and counsel individual situations. The victim's name remains confidential.

The primary responsibility is to the victim and her needs, but the Women's Resource Center would like to systematically tabulate the incidents — whether they are reported to the proper authorities or revealed in the confidence of a counselor, Davis said.

Counselors need to develop a behind-the-scenes network to increase the awareness of potential victims, decrease the environmental risks on campus and evaluate current methods of handling the incidents, she said.

Davis said that Chimes Junior Honorary has offered assistance in date rape awareness by presenting a film and initiating discussion within campus living groups.

A committee is establishing an anonymous incident report form. Eyewitnesses and victims can describe details of a crime without revealing their identity, she said.

"The intent of the form is to assure even women who don't report an assault to the police that the information can get in the hands of people who need to have it to change existing situations," Davis said.

The University is drafting a sexual violence policy. The sexual assault task force has divided into three teams and has organized initial drafts concerning the policy, adjudication and education of sexual assaults on campus, Scott said.

"The draft will not preclude criminal court actions but will coincide with legal procedures," she said.

'National Enquirer journalism' no longer just for tabloids

Commentary

DWAYNE LIVELY
Collegian Columnist

On one of his shows last year, Geraldo Rivera's topic was the Natalie Wood drowning. He was trying to get a woman who was present on the yacht at the time of the drowning to admit that there was foul play. When the woman refused to give in to his pressure, Geraldo turned to the audience and asked, "How many of you think she's guilty?" A lot of people applauded, evidently supporting his claim.

Last Thursday on a show about the Mike Tyson/Robin Givens divorce, Geraldo said to the panel, "My audience believes, and I believe they are representative of the country in general, that Robin Givens set Mike Tyson up." Again the audience applauded.

Rivera seems to have it in his head that truth is somehow determined via the democratic process. His attitude is that if the majority of people believe something is true, it must be true.

Unfortunately, Rivera is a mere symptom of a much larger trend in American television. Television is slowly becoming more and more like the tabloids in the grocery store and "truth" is becoming more and more open to a vote.

In the past two years, a number of TV shows have appeared that promise to deal with "real people, in real life situations." They recreate "true" court cases using actors and include shows like "Superior Court," "The Judge" and "Divorce Court." No real justification of these shows is given, though some have said their purpose is to show the "average citizen" how the American legal system works.

Unfortunately, due to the time restraints of the half-hour format, which must include X-amount of commercials, most of the legal aspects of the cases are ignored in favor of the sleazy aspects, which appeal to a wider audience. These court shows are not public service spots. They are entertainment gimmicks. They provide "National Enquirer" news/entertainment that viewers seem to enjoy a great deal.

These new shows are very popular and newer ones are popping up all the time. There is even a show this season where "real-life doctors" diagnose the symptoms of real-life actors to teach real-life viewers about "medical issues." You can't help but suspect that a lot of these "issues" will include venereal disease, sexual disfunction, and breast cancer because, while viewers enjoy witnessing "real-life drama," they also enjoy being titilated. These new shows feel compelled to combine these two desires. American television, as a result, is slowly becoming the "National Enquirer Theater."

This trend has also created a number of tabloid news/entertainment programs that have adopted the "60 Minutes" and "20/20" format. The worst of these is the Fox network's "The Reporters." The segments on this show are typically about some murder or prostitution ring or drug dealers.

The most popular of the news/entertainment shows is "America's Most Wanted." This show has actually become a public service of sorts. The show graphically recreates the crimes of wanted criminals and shows the public their faces so citizens can help find them. Almost 20 criminals have been apprehended thanks to this show. The show, therefore, seems to be very helpful. Yet it, like the other tabloid programs, is mainly entertainment.

The faces of missing children on milk cartons have helped return hundreds to their families without anyone doing graphic reenactments of their kidnappings. Faces on boxes, however, don't give networks higher ratings and increased advertising revenue.

Money, as usual, is the bottom line in tabloid television. Television is, after all, in the business of making money and it does that via advertising, not entertainment. If networks didn't need entertainment to sell advertising time, there would be no shows like "Cagney and Lacey," "Cheers" or even "Geraldo Rivera." We would see endless hours of commercials, which we seem to see anyway.

The nasty result of all this is that, in order to compete financially with the tabloid programs, more and more newspapers and TV news are joining the "National Enquirer Theater." Cameras are being allowed inside courtrooms during murder cases. There is even a show on now that does this every day. One can't help but wonder when we will get to see executions on TV without having to rent a splatter film. Won't that be exciting?

As court cases become increasingly open to public scrutiny, they have a tendency to be decided via the media. Instead of a trial by a jury of 12, the litigants are given a trial by a jury of 10 to 15 million, none of whom get the full story, because courts cannot legally release certain information to the press about pending cases. The result is muddled cases, like the Tywana Brawley rape case. People make half-baked decisions based on half-truths and incomplete evidence, and no one gets justice because the justice system doesn't get a chance to work.

The most dangerous thing about tabloid television is that it has affected every part of our lives. It is no longer easy to distinguish between news and entertainment. Substance and truth have been abandoned in favor of style and entertainment. Even our presidential elections have felt this. In this election, we are stuck with a choice between two carefully sculpted images, not two leaders.

In his own blundering way, Rivera may have hit on exactly why tabloid television has become so popular. He said of the Tyson/Givens case "We're interested in these people because their problems are bigger than life, and maybe seeing them exposes flaws in all of us." He was right. When we examine ourselves, we see that we have become a nation of gossips. Let's hope tabloid television fades away soon, before it has a chance to become too entrenched in our lives.

Whales trapped by ice get too much attention

If all the time and energy that has been spent trying to free the whales that are trapped in the Alaskan ice could be channeled toward balancing the budget, curing cancer or ending hunger, then the world would be a better place to live in.

But it hasn't.

Instead, a lot of time and energy has been spent by the Reagan administration trying to show concern for these poor creatures and tap into the media bonanza.

Considering that Reagan is the same president who appointed James Watt to be Secretary of the Interior and once claimed that trees cause pollution, it is hard to believe he suddenly cares about the environment and any creatures who inhabit it except registered voters.

He is just cashing in on a very human phenomenon — the humanizing of tragedy.

Joesph Stalin explained it well when he said, "One million deaths is a statistic, but one death is a tragedy."

Even though whales aren't human, the concern works the same way. Little protest is heard when hundreds of whales are slaughtered for their blubber each year, but when three of them are trapped by a natural occurance, and unduely focused on by the media, then Reagan bends over backwards trying to help them.

Whether the whales live or die, Reagan goes down as the president who tried to save the whales.

Coverage lacking

Editor,

Yet another insensitivity of the Collegian to the international students.

Last fall, I remember an American team won the intramural soccer tournament and it was covered as a major story in the Collegian. This fall the final was between MCA (Muslim Community Association) and Arabo and the Collegian did not even bother to cover it as news, to say the least. This appears to me to be overt discrimination against international students. After all, the international students pay out-of-state resident tuition fee and therefore are entitled to fair coverage of their activities by the so-called student newspaper.

Questions raised

Editor,

Brian Hummel's article on Oct. 19 brought an interesting question to mind. Who are those people in plain clothes distributing parking tickets in campus lots with the fine payable at Kansas State Security and Traffic? No, that isn't it. Does a badge and a gun make someone a police officer? No, wrong again. Oh, now I remember, can Security and Traffic be defined as Police Department? I don't think so.

Memorial opinion

Editor,

With yet another fiasco plaguing the KSU Vietnam Veterans Memorial, I would like to express some thoughts on the subject. Saying "thank-you" is nice and all and maybe it helps clear the heavy conscience. But rather than a thank-you, an apology is probably more appropriate. Unfortunately, time has passed and many wouldn't know why we are apologizing. Let's face it. Many don't know Ho Chi Minh from Hue.

Anti-war statements aren't appropriate either. We've known, long before Vietnam, that wars are not the best way to settle conflicts, but it didn't stop us from going there. Many of the students of that time knew the war was wrong but didn't care until the government started looking toward the campus for more cannon fodder.

I would like to think that at K-State we could focus on the lessons learned. It would probably best serve those who served us, including the 38 who died, those who are dying from the chemical effects, and those who suffer mentally and physically. By learning the lessons of war, these men will not have fought in vain. After all, "Those who forget history are doomed to repeat it."

Remove fork

Editor,

For the past few years, our beautiful campus has had an ugly scar of mockery and pornographic suggestion standing right in the middle of it. This disgraceful object I am referring to is what is otherwise known as "The Fork," standing in front of King Hall.

Why not have something nice people can relate to, such as a big bronze statue of John Wayne, or a marble statue of a dairy cow. Oh sure, you can claim the fork is great art because you can interpret it any way you like, but this makes the object meaningless and very uninspirational. In today's confusing world, we need simple messages with good moral ethics, not some big hard-on pillar to pollute everyone's mind with sexual connotations and hidden Freudian lust.

As I see it, this fork can represent either dinner or sex, and I sure do not see any knives or spoons beside it. Imagine a new freshman walking to class for the first time in his college career, when right in front of the building is this big concrete rod. He's probably thinking that he'll get reamed in his very first class and maybe should just forget about college. But, if there was a statue of John Wayne, then he could feel very at ease because what could be more inspirational than John Wayne to motivate new students.

If you ever go to the Manhattan City Park, you will find a big smiling statue of Paul Bunyan, spreading good cheer to all who see it. But, if you walk to your class every morning you find nothing but a meaningless rod of concrete towering over your head. I suggest that for future planning, the University officials confer with the Manhattan City Council before deciding on what art to display, since the University officials obviously have no taste in art.

'Excellence for All' to be conference theme

By Sarah Kobs
Collegian Reporter

Proclaimed as the "best and largest in the nation," the 10th Annual Rural and Small Schools Conference will take place in the Union today and Tuesday.

Barb Havlicek, assistant director of the Center for Rural Education and Small Schools, is on the committee which planned the conference. The center is a division of the College of Education.

"This is the first year we've had a waiting list of people wanting to give presentations at the conference," Havlicek said. "We're real pleased with the size it is now, but we may expand next year to accommodate more people."

The conference expects between 300 to 350 people, she said. "Excellence for All" is its theme.

"The national conference in Bismarck, N.D., had approximately 500 people attend, so we're proud to have 300 people register to attend this one," Havlicek said. "It's a real benefit to our campus.

"It's important for everyone to know about education and be interested in rural education."

Jerry Horn, director of the Center for Rural Education and Small Schools, said there are about 10 conferences of this type across the nation.

"Our conference has been publicly proclaimed as the best and largest in the nation," Horn said. "There will be around 30 states represented this year."

The keynote address, "Excellence in Rural Education: Our Heritage and Our Future," will be delivered by Duane Nielsen of the U.S. Department of Education. His speech will be in Forum Hall at 10:15 a.m.

Nielson is the deputy director of the Division of Innovation and Development for the Office of Vocational and Adult Education within the Department of Education.

Other featured speakers include: Dwight Bode, president of the National Rural Education Association; Howard Tokerund, vice president of the American Association of School Administrators; and Judy Smith Davis, editor of "Counterpoint," a national special education publication.

Special awards for excellence in rural education will be given at a banquet tonight. The awards will be for the outstanding administrator, outstanding school project and outstanding essay. The essay awards will be given to three junior-high and three high-school students from rural schools, Havlicek said.

"We'd like for more teachers to be able to attend, but it's hard for them to take off in the middle of the week," she said. "There will be several administrators and school board representatives here."

The administrators trade information about their school districts and find new solutions to problems, Havlicek said. The school districts benefit by getting new educational ideas.

"Across the country, small schools serving rural areas are doing quite well," Horn said. "The state and federal governments have recognized the high academic ability and graduation rates in small schools, so more funding has become available."

Horn said small school districts must be innovative when developing educational programs because their funds are lower than large districts' funds. Educators have to be creative and come up with programs that will enhance the students' education, he said.

Havlicek is expecting several students from the College of Education to attend and hopes students from other colleges will attend some of the sessions.

K-State faculty members and full-time students can attend the sessions free. There will be more than 70 concurrent sessions today and Tuesday, Havlicek said.

The event is sponsored by K-State's Center for Rural Education and Small Schools, the American Association of School Administrators and the Mid-Continent Regional Educational Laboratory.

Registration is from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. today in the Union on the second floor concourse. Today's concurrent sessions are from 9 a.m. until 5:30 p.m. The sessions Tuesday are from 8 to 11:45 a.m.

Service sells millions of addresses

By The Collegian Staff

Imagine grabbing the day's mail, hoping to find a long-awaited letter. Even though the stack is inches thick, the only item that isn't junk mail is addressed to a roommate.

Applied Computer Service in Hutchinson could be one of the culprits for the junk mail people receive, but it is possible to have unwanted mail stopped.

ACS direct mailing service mails two million pieces of mail each month and has 60 million names on file in its computer, said Russell Johnston, president of ACS.

"We're like a service bureau," Johnston said. The Hutchinson office, which employs 42 people, services the advertising mailing needs for thousands of businesses across the United States.

Direct mailing services purchase the names on their mailing lists from companies. The names are then categorized on the direct mailing service's computers by age, name and household evaluations.

Even if people don't respond to any of the company's mailings, they could stay on the mailing list for up to four years, depending on the buying cycle of the items being advertised, Johnston said.

How frequently an item is purchased helps determine how often it is advertised, Johnston said. Advertisements for frequently purchased items, such as groceries, are mailed more often than big-ticket items, such as cars.

The mailing list is continually updated. ACS gets updated names and address changes from The National Change of Address Service every two weeks, he said.

"It's a never-ending process," Johnston said.

It is possible to remove a name from the list, Johnston said. When someone makes a purchase from a company, there will usually be fine print and a box to darken if the person doesn't want promotional mail.

Making a specific request to the Direct Mailing Association in New York is another method of erasing a name from a list, he said.

'Huskers set record in win against 'Cats

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

K-State's football team gave a repeat performance of its first six games of the season in its 48-3 loss to Nebraska Saturday in KSU Stadium. The Wildcats seemed to improve in some aspects of their previous efforts, only to slide in other areas while going down to defeat.

Nebraska's victory assures the Cornhuskers of a winning season, setting an National Collegiate Athletic Association Division I-A record for the most consecutive winning seasons, 27.

The winning streak broke a tie Nebraska shared with Penn State (1939-64) and Alabama (1958-83). In the past 19 seasons, and in 24 of the past 26, the 'Huskers have won at least nine games. The closest they came to losing seasons were 6-4 campaigns in 1967 and 1968. The latter year was the last time K-State beat Nebraska.

"We're proud of the record because of the consistency it brings to our program. We have good coaches and good players come through this program, which builds up tradition and consistency," Nebraska coach Tom Osborne said. "When you have this kind of a winning tradition, it breeds a certain kind of success."

Nebraska went to 7-1 overall and 3-0 in the Big Eight Conference. K-State dropped to 0-7 and 0-3.

One bright spot in the contest for K-State was place-kicker Mark Porter. Porter's 61-yard field goal in the first quarter gave the 'Cats their only points of the game and set a K-State record.

"I thought I'd get a chance to kick a long field goal, but I was surprised I got a chance in the first quarter," Porter said. "In the first quarter, it's a pretty risky situation. (Coach Stan Parrish) obviously had faith in me and I'm just glad that he gave me the chance.

"I would have liked to have got in there and kicked three or four more and some extra points, but it didn't go that way."

Parrish said his squad "battled very hard" against Nebraska.

"Obviously we were outmanned, but we made them work out there today," Parrish said. "We played harder this week than we played last week (against Oklahoma) and that's what I was looking for from this team.

"We have played eight quarters against really quality athletes in the last week," he added. "If our kids will keep competing the way they have been, I think we can win a game or two."

While the 'Cats defense had its moments, giving up only 14 points in the second half, the Wildcat offense struggled the entire game.

"(The offense) moved the ball well today, but we did not do a good job like we have been doing in the scoring zone," Parrish said.

Going into Saturday's game, the 'Cats were leading the Big Eight in passing yardage with an average of 260 yards per game. K-State was last in the conference in rushing yards.

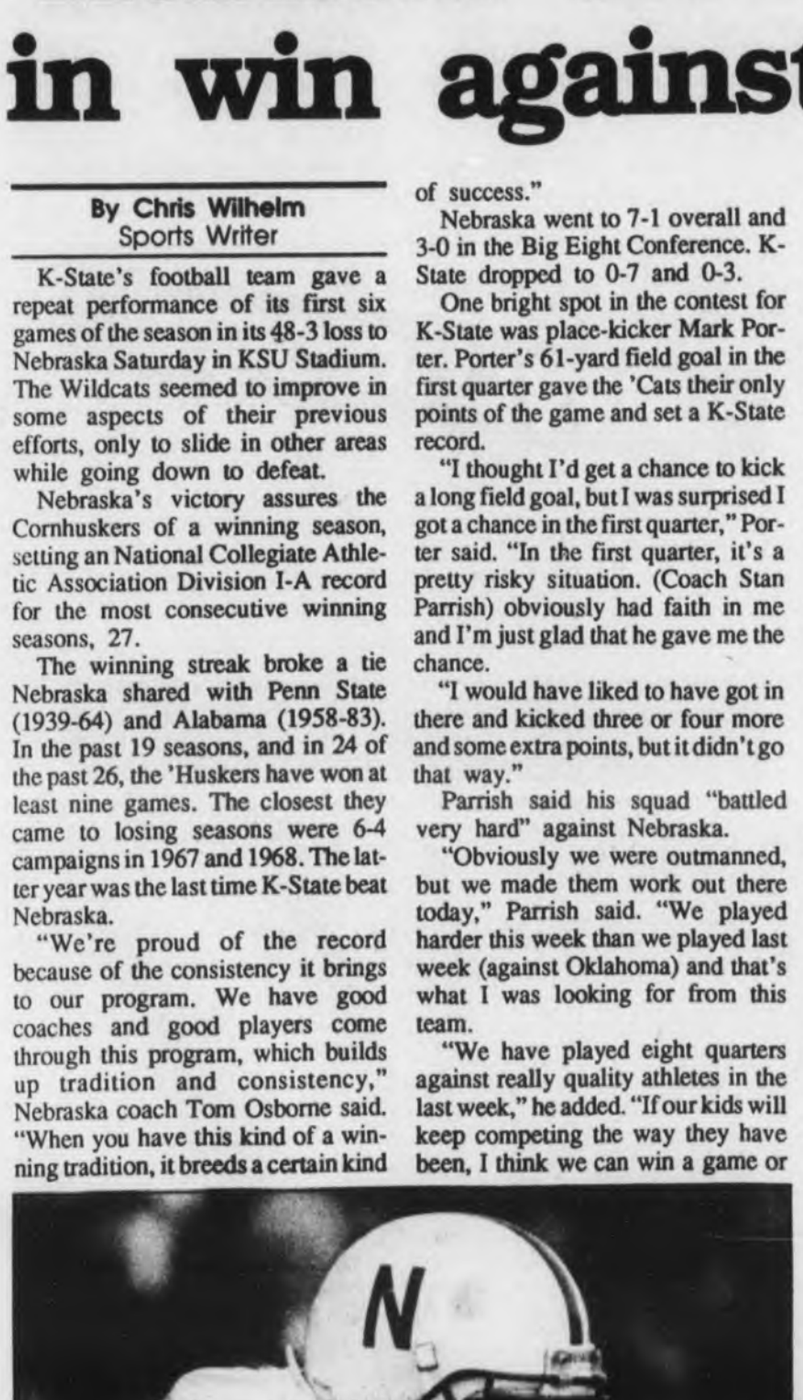
Against the Huskers, K-State quarterbacks Carl Straw and Chris Cobb completed only 15 of 36 passes for 145 yards, with two interceptions. The 'Cats weren't able to reach their rushing average either, as they gained only 54 yards on the ground.

"Straw was effective at times, (but) other times he threw into some coverages that he shouldn't have. He had a couple of dropped balls early in the game, and I think that might have rattled him a little," Parrish said.

"We played hard today but there were some things that we didn't do well. We gave up a couple of big plays on defense following turnovers and that was the difference in the game."

The wind also was a big factor. K-State punted into the wind five of six times, averaging only 28.5 yards per kick. On two punts, Nebraska received the ball in K-State territory but scored only once, a 37-yard field goal by Gregg Barrios.

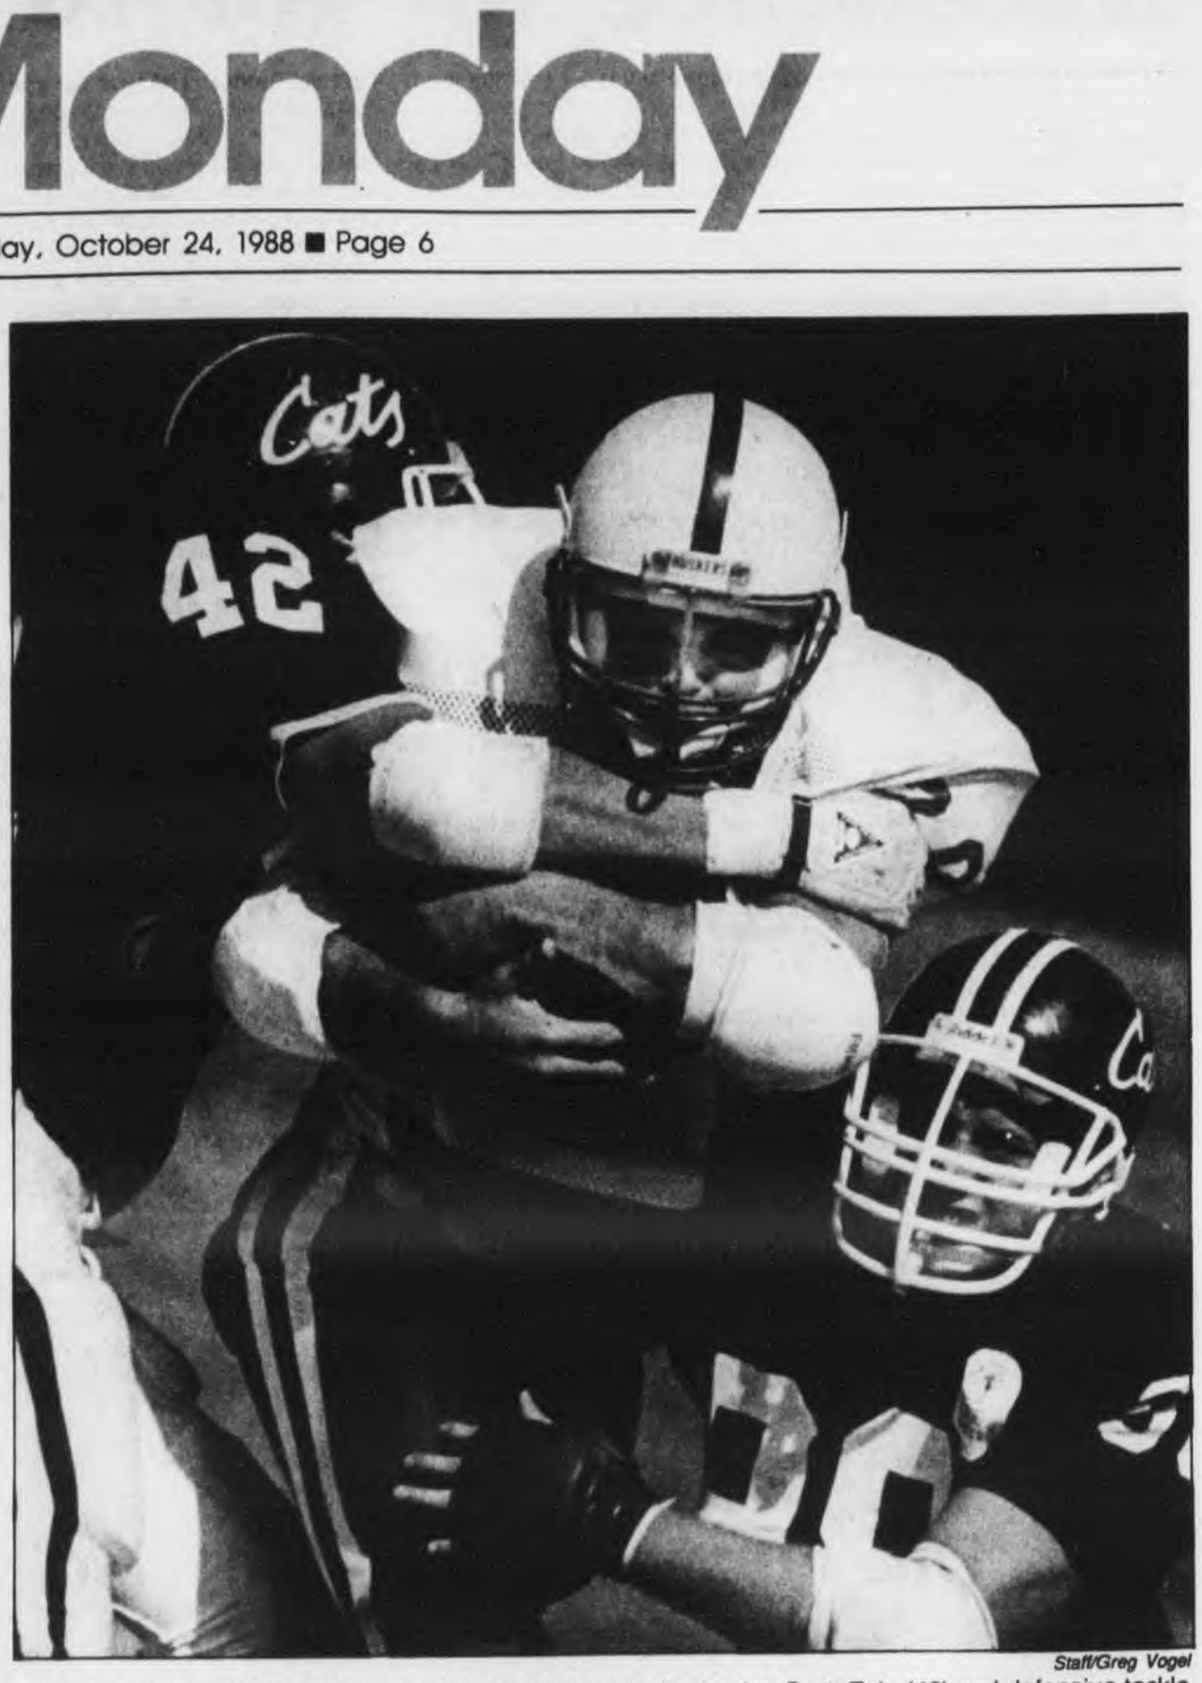
"We just can't turn the ball over on the short side of the field and expect to win, and we gave it away twice inside our own 30-yard line," Parrish said.



K-State defensive end Danny Needham agreed with Parrish's assessment of Nebraska.

"That's the most tired I've ever felt before in my life," Needham said. "I didn't realize how hard they were hitting until I got in the locker room for halftime. I'm sure I'll be sore for a couple of days."

Both Needham and inside linebacker Maurice Henry said K-State had more confidence this week.



"At halftime, we felt pretty good and we felt that we could go out and shut them down the second half. We played better against Nebraska than we did against Oklahoma and I think we'll play even better against Oklahoma State," Needham said.

"I think last week when we played Oklahoma, everyone was a little scared and intimidated," Henry added. "This week it was not like that at all. We knew that they would be bigger than us, but we went out there with the attitude that we had to stick them hard and plug up the holes."

Nebraska I-back Tyreese Knox had a season-high four touchdowns rushing in the 'Huskers' win over K-State Saturday in KSU Stadium.

Cornhusker fullback Bryan Carpenter is brought down by linebacker Scott Zele (42) and defensive tackle Doug Blackbourne (98). With its win, Nebraska set an NCAA record for consecutive winning seasons.

Nebraska fullback experiences homecoming at K-State game

By Mike Rouse
Sports Writer

For Nebraska's Lance Lewis, coming to Manhattan and playing against K-State in football Saturday was a homecoming of sorts.

"It was kind of cool coming back and seeing some of the players on the team and my family," Lewis said.

Lewis lives in Scott City, where last year he garnered All-State honors as a fullback and a linebacker and was named player of the year in Kansas. He was also the 1987 class 4-A shot-put champion.

K-State and Nebraska recruited Lewis heavily. Lewis' brother Rick played for the Wildcats from 1984 to 1987. But, when it came time to choose, Lewis went with the winning program.

"There is no doubt about it, I definitely made the right choice on coming up here," he said.

Freshmen usually don't make the varsity or traveling teams at Nebraska. They usually are redshirted or play on the freshman team.

"I had my mind set on playing freshmen ball and getting redshirted," he said.

As practice continued, the coaches hinted to Lewis that he might have a chance to make the team. After making the team, he was told he was on the traveling squad.

"In a way, I'm real glad that I was able to make the team instead of being redshirted because I'm getting to play a lot more," he said.

Against K-State on Saturday, Lewis carried the ball for 18 yards in three carries. He matched his longest run of year with a rush for 12 yards in the third quarter.

"I was pumped up a little bit more today. I thought I played all right today," he said.

For the year, Lewis has rushed for 96 yards in 22 carries.

Porter hits record-setting field goal

By Chris Hays
Sports Writer

Before Saturday's Nebraska — K-State game in KSU Stadium, senior place-kicker Mark Porter and Coach Stan Parrish talked about the wind conditions.

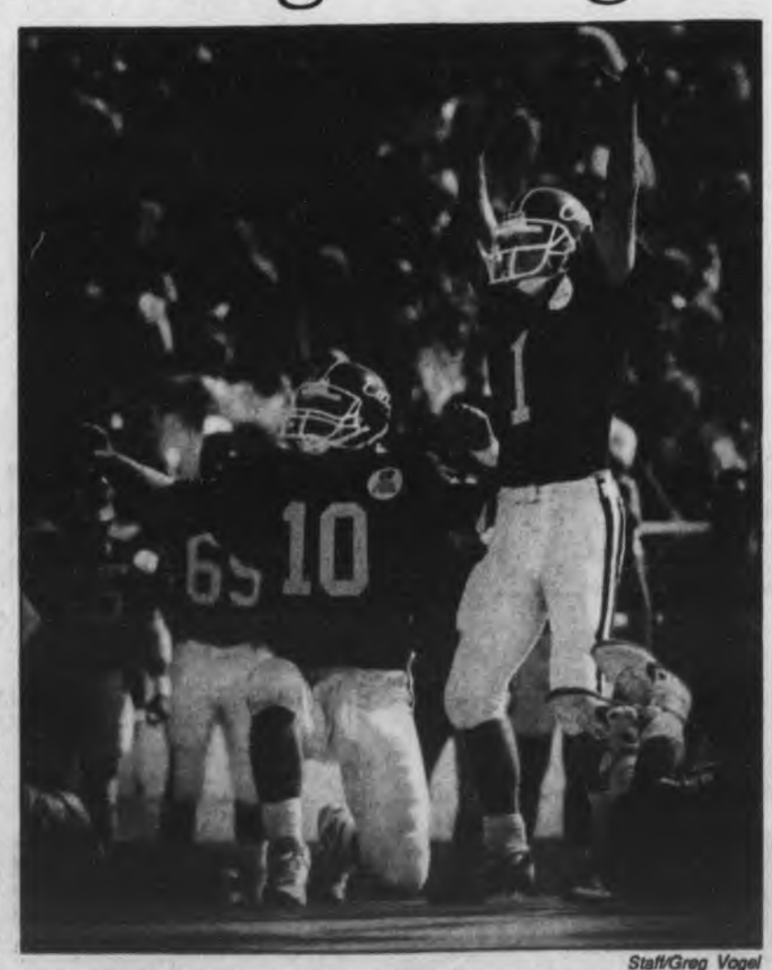
Even though Porter said he and Parrish always converse on the subject before a game, this day turned out to be unlike any other day. While he was reluctant to talk about his K-State record-breaking 61-yard field goal in the Wildcats' 48-3 loss to No. 5 Nebraska, the Salina product was still happy.

"I really wanted to get it this year," Porter said. "I would like to get the Big Eight record, but that is just something that will have to happen if the opportunity presents itself."

And Porter has no doubts that he can break the Big Eight Conference record, which is owned by Missouri's Tom Whelihan, who hit a 62-yarder in 1986 against Colorado.

"Oh, yeah," Porter said, referring to whether the Big Eight record was possible. "I didn't even hit that one very good today, but I just feel lucky enough that coach Parrish gave me the chance."

The wind might have been the reason Parrish gave Porter that chance. A pre-game estimate put the wind at 18 mph out of the south. Wind or no wind, Porter nailed his kick — which happened to be K-State's only points of the day.



"Well, I guess so," said Porter when asked after the game if he had a few moments to talk about his feat. "You would just like it to come under better circumstances. I was fortunate enough to get the opportunity today, but you still would like to get the win."

And a place-kicker's dream would be to get that win in the waining moments with a field goal.

Porter only has four more games in which to accomplish that feat. He came close last year in K-State's 17-17 tie against Kansas when his attempt with three seconds left in the game was blocked.

Porter's previous career high was two weeks ago at Norman, Okla., when he hit a 53-yard field goal in K-State's 70-24 loss to the Sooners.

In the past three seasons, Porter has led the team in scoring. He is third on the career scoring chart with 138 points, but it is unlikely he will move any higher. Third-place holder Mack Herron scored 188 points.

Oklahoma receives scare against Buffs

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — R.D. Lashar was saving his first field goal for just the right time.

Lashar kicked a 22-yard field goal with 8:15 to play as the eighth-ranked Sooners turned back Colorado 17-14. It was the first field goal of the season for Oklahoma, 7-1 overall and 3-0 in the Big Eight.

"I was really anxious to get one in," said Lashar, who missed a 66-yard attempt earlier this season. "I was a little bit nervous, but I was kicking really well in the pre-game warmup."

In other Big Eight games, No. 15 Oklahoma State downed Missouri 49-21 and Iowa State kept Kansas winless 42-14.

Joe Henderson and the wind beat Kansas at Ames.

Henderson rushed for 226 yards and the wind blew down Kansas punts in the third quarter to help the Cyclones to good field position.

"All I did was run and just cut a couple of times," said Henderson, who scored a school-record five touchdowns. "The credit really has to go to the offensive line. I really feel good about my running. Any running back who says he isn't proud would be lying, but I feel the offensive line is really the one that did it."

The Cyclones now have consecutive victories over Missouri and Kansas to advance to 4-3 and 2-1.

"We got ourselves in a bind in the first half and then came back and I thought the momentum would carry us into the second half," said Kansas Coach Glen Mason, now 0-7 and 0-3 in his first season. "But we had some problems right away in the second half and with the wind against us, it just didn't work out."

Big 8 Roundup

It isn't working out for Missouri, which wasted a gritty, first-half defensive performance to fall to the Cowboys, who are 5-1 and 2-1.

"They made some big plays in the second half and they deserved to win," said Tigers coach Woody Widenhofer, 2-4 and 1-2 after the loss at Stillwater. "This game of football is so much momentum and they got it going in the second half and we didn't generate the offense."

Stars Barry Sanders and Hart Lee Dykes continued to lead Oklahoma State, but Coach Pat Jones was happy to see his defense rebound after giving 63 points to Nebraska the week before.

"I thought we did a pretty good job of getting out there and flying around the ball," Jones said.

World Series time brings back fond memories

Svoboda on Sports

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Columnist

"Give me one moment in time, when I'm more than I thought I could be, when all of my dreams are a heartbeat away, and the answers are all up to me."

— Whitney Houston, "One Moment in Time"

In every World Series, there are special moments that set the Series apart from any other sporting event in the world.

Baseball is a unique game, a curious mixture of blood, sweat and human emotion not found anywhere else.

In the past 15 years, there have been several "moments in time" in the Fall Classic, and the 1988 Series, with the new champions from Los Angeles on center stage, provided its share of unforgettable moments to add to the memory banks.

My Series memories begin in 1975, with Cincinnati facing Boston in what was probably the best Series ever — before or since.

It was Game 6, Cincinnati led the Series 3-2, and Boston's Fenway Park was hushed as Red Sox catcher Carlton Fisk moved to the plate.

With one mighty swing and a great deal of body english, Fisk sent the ball upward into the Massachusetts night where it hit the foul pole in left, just above Fenway's infamous "Green Monster" outfield wall, for a game-winning and Series-tying homer.

I'll never forget Fisk, waving his arms frantically in an attempt to wish the ball fair, and the mob he met when he reached home plate. It was simply incredible. Even though Cincinnati won the final game and the title, it was one for the ages.

It was the stuff the World Series is made of.

I'll also never forget 1979, as the final out was recorded in Pittsburgh's seven-game triumph over Baltimore. Watching veteran Pirate first baseman Willie Stargell leap into the air like a little kid was truly unforgettable. He was "Pops," the leader of "The Family," and he had just taken his clan to the top of their chosen profession.

Yet it was emotion that made the moment.

The early '80's were a blur of great Series moments, including Pete Rose's catch of a foul ball that bounced off the glove of catcher Bob Boone in Philadelphia's 1980 win over Kansas City, but each of the last four Fall Classics has provided a classic memory.

In the 1985 Series, my most vivid memory, as a Royals fan, was of former St. Louis Cardinal Dane Iorg coming to the plate in Game 6 with the game on the line.

What happened over the next several seconds is still a blur to me, but it ended with Iorg at first base with a bloody nose, Jim Sundberg doing a head-first slide around the sweeping tag of Darrell Porter, and Buddy Biancalana almost being knocked over by the jubilant Sundberg as the duo celebrated the winning run.

Iorg, you see, had gained a measure of revenge against his former mates by getting the game-winning hit. The bloody nose came from a forearm to the face Iorg suffered during Kansas City's impromptu celebration around the hero. I still get goosebumps thinking about it.

The 1986 World Series classic was a play current Royals designated hitter Bill Buckner would rather forget, because it came on a ground ball through his legs. You know the play. You've seen it dozens of times. It ended with Ray Knight and his New York Met teammates celebrating, and with Buckner and the Red Sox seemingly finding yet another way to lose a heartbreaker.

The 1987 World Series classic was courtesy of a group of "Homer Hanky"-waving fans in Minnesota. The Dallas slips past Spurs in exhibition game

By Chris Hays
Sports Writer

The opinions after Friday night's Dallas Mavericks — San Antonio Spurs NBA exhibition game at Fred Bramlage Coliseum were mixed.

Some thought the game was boring. Some thought it was action-packed. And some didn't really care.

At least the fans did get a thrilling ending as the Mavericks came from behind to win 105-103.

But what most of the 4,506 fans that attended cared about was the return of former K-State All-American Rolando Blackman. A lot of them were hoping that Blackman would score the first basket in the first official basketball game in Bramlage.

It didn't happen. Nine seconds into the game, San Antonio's Greg Anderson scored the first bucket.

"I started thinking about (making the first shot) a lot after I overheard someone talking upstairs," Blackman said. "They said, 'I wonder who is going to score the first basket in Bramlage,' and then I started thinking that I wouldn't mind doing that."

As it turned out, Blackman scored the second basket, 18 seconds later, en route to 14 points in just 27 minutes of playing time.

Overall, the play was ragged. In fact, to open the second half, the two teams combined took nearly two minutes to score nine points — not your average NBA run.

Finally, the game started to get exciting. Down by 17 early in the third quarter, Dallas made a run and got within four points at start the fourth period.

From there, the Spurs' lead got no larger than six, but they kept that slim lead until Derek Harper hit a 15-foot jumper with 2:32 left, giving the Mavericks a 98-97 advantage. The Mavericks held on for the two-point win.

That made most of the crowd happy, but the main event was the return of Blackman.

"I wish we could have played in Ahearn," Blackman said. "But I'm still proud to be helping start a new tradition. It really gets loud in here (Bramlage). You can hear the fans talking on the sidelines, and that kind of abuse is what college basketball needs.

"But I will miss Ahearn. That place has a lot of tradition. People knew, coming down here, that they always had a great chance of losing."

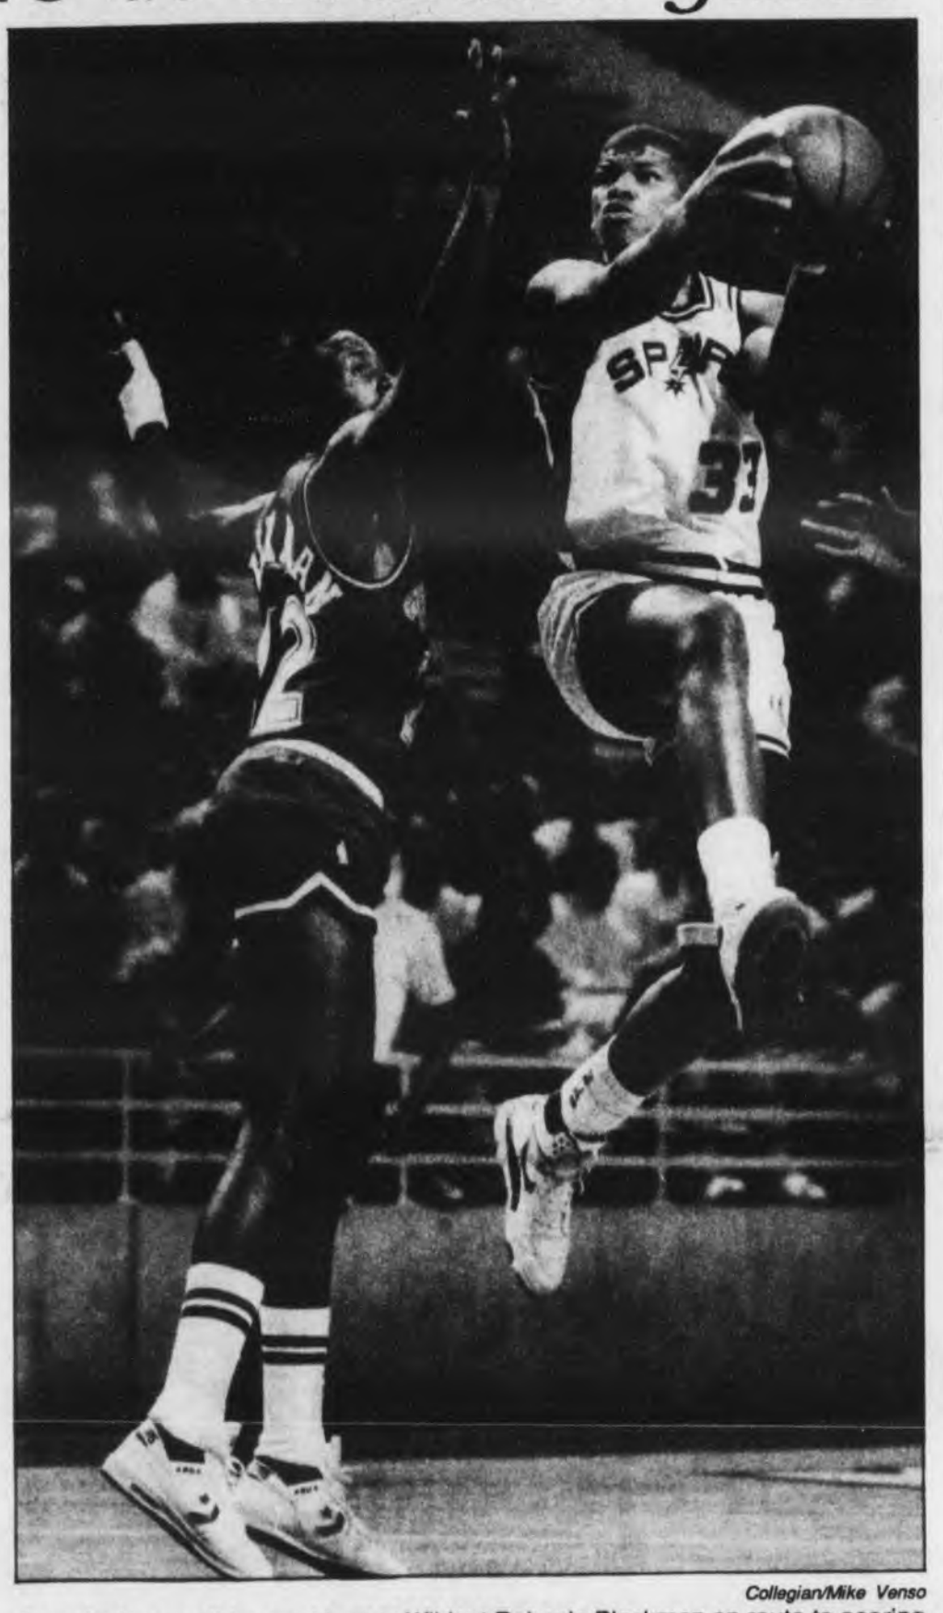
Blackman, who said he usually makes it back to Manhattan every summer but couldn't this past summer, was happy to be back at his alma mater.

"It's a lot of fun," Blackman said. "There were a lot of great things that happened to me here. I just wish that I could stay tomorrow so that I could walk around the campus a little bit and look at everything again, but we have a game."

Some people may find it hard to believe that talents such as Blackman or Mitch Richmond would even consider coming to Manhattan to play basketball. But Blackman had a unique reason.

During his recruiting trip in 1977, he thought the campus greenery reminded him so much of his native Panama that he decided to sign with then-coach Jack Hartman.

From that time, Blackman became a star, earning Big Eight player of the year honors his junior year.



After that, Blackman was chosen as the ninth player overall in the 1981 NBA draft and has since helped build the eight-year-old Dallas franchise into a contender. Last year, the Mavericks were just one game shy of the NBA championship series, but fell to the Los Angeles Lakers in game seven of the conference finals, 117-102.

Blackman has aspirations of being a television news anchor when his pro basketball career is over.

Wildcats win two of three in Oklahoma

By Russ Ewy
Sports Writer

Three points.

That's how close K-State's volleyball squad was from upsetting 12th-ranked Oklahoma.

The Wildcats, back on a roll after a nine-match losing streak, won two of three weekend matches, losing only to the Sooners in five games Friday night in Norman, Okla.

On Saturday, K-State defeated Tulsa and Oral Roberts in Tulsa, Okla.

"We had several chances to put Oklahoma away and didn't do it," K-State coach Scott Nelson said. "We haven't been in that position a lot lately. I feel that the keys to our success were that we were very physical along the net, both offensively and defensively. We knew that Oklahoma played very physically at the net and that's what we've been working on in practice."

Against the Big Eight Conference-leading Sooners, K-State jumped out to a two-game lead before losing 13-15, 13-15, 15-10, 15-7 and 15-12.

"We're playing well again," Nelson said. "If you are ever going to feel good about a loss, I guess it would be one to the team ranked 12th."

The 'Cats bounced back by sweeping Tulsa and Oral Roberts on Saturday in three-game matches. The team's record is 12-10 and they play Kansas at home Wednesday.

"I think we really regained our confidence in the final two matches (against Tulsa and Oral Roberts), even though, from a coaching standpoint, I knew that we were a very good team," Nelson said.

"I think we're back to playing real good volleyball and that we have been building to that for the past few weeks to get out of our mid-season slump that we have been in," he added.

K-State swept the Tulsa Golden Hurricane, 15-9, 15-3, 15-8 Saturday morning.

The 'Cats then packed up and headed across town to the campus of Oral Roberts University and crushed the Titans, 15-2, 15-6, 15-11.

"We were a little worried about the distractions of traveling so much on Saturday," Nelson said. "But we talked about it before we left and we handled it very well."

Miami's Marino throws for 521 yards

By The Associated Press

In the end, Dan Marino didn't get any of what he was shooting for.

The star quarterback of the Miami Dolphins had the biggest passing day of his career and the second-most yardage in NFL history, 521 yards. It wasn't enough Sunday as the New York Jets beat the Dolphins 44-30.

Marino's yardage was second to Norm Van Brocklin of the Los Angeles Rams, who threw for 554 yards against the New York Yankees in 1951. But Marino also was intercepted five times. Three were taken by Erik McMillan, who returned one 55 yards for a score.

The Jets built a 30-10 halftime lead, getting 24 points in the second quarter. Then Marino really went to work. But each time the Dolphins got within a touchdown, the Jets would score or make a key defensive play.

"It's nice to get the yards, but it doesn't mean much when you lose," Marino said. "You can throw for 900 yards, but if you throw the interception, it doesn't matter.

Marino completed 35 of 60 passes and threw for three touchdowns. He broke his own team record for passing yardage, 470, set against the Los Angeles Raiders in 1984. Marino also threw 57 times in that game, his previous high. The six-year veteran topped the 400 mark for the eighth time in his career, extending his NFL record.

Elsewhere, it was Philadelphia 24, Dallas 23; the New York Giants 23, Atlanta 16; Cincinnati 44, Houston 21; New Orleans 20, the Los Angeles Raiders 6; Buffalo 23, New England 20, and Minnesota 49, Tampa Bay 20.

In late games, the Los Angeles Rams routed Seattle 31-10; Indianapolis blanked San Diego 16-0; Washington beat Green Bay 20-17, and Cleveland took Phoenix 29-21.

On Monday night, San Francisco is at Chicago.

Rams 31, Seahawks 10

Jim Everett continued his superb play, completing 20 of 27 passes for 311 yards and three touchdowns. Everett threw scoring passes of 37 yards to Robert Delpino, one yard to Damone Johnson and 32 yards to Aaron Cox. It was the third consecutive game in which Everett has passed for three scores. His 19 touchdown passes tops the NFC and gives him one more than he threw in the 1986 and 1987 seasons combined.

Los Angeles, 6-2, remained one game behind first-place New Orleans in the NFC West. Seattle dropped to 4-4 but is tied for the AFC West lead with Denver.

Colts 16, Chargers 0

Eric Dickerson became the eighth NFL player with more than 9,000 career rushing yards, going for 169 at San Diego. Dean Biasucci kicked three field goals and the Colts defense did not allow the Chargers past the Indianapolis 25.

Redskins 20, Packers 17

At Milwaukee, Doug Williams made a triumphant return from five weeks on the sidelines after an appendectomy. The Super Bowl MVP led Washington on two long second-half scoring drives and Kelvin Bryant rushed for 140 yards. Williams connected on 25 of 43 passes for 225 yards.

The Redskins, 5-3, remained tied with the Giants for first place in the NFC East.

Green Bay, 2-6, had a chance to tie the game with 11 seconds left but former Redskins kicker Max Zendejas missed a 24-yard field goal.

Browns 29, Cardinals 21

Like Williams, Bernie Kosar came back in style. Kosar missed six weeks with an elbow injury, but he threw for 314 yards and three touchdowns Sunday. Kosar, completed 25 of 43 passes, including 20 of 28 for 224 yards in the first half. He hit a 25-yard pass to Reggie Langhorne with 8:14 remaining for the winning points, but also was picked off three times.

Cleveland, 5-3, owner of the NFL's best pass defense, intercepted backup quarterback Cliff Stoudt twice in a three-minute span late in the fourth quarter and also sacked him for a safety with 1:43 remaining.

The Cardinals, 4-4, fell out of a first-place tie in the NFC East.

Kansas City owner plans to keep Gansz

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Lamar Hunt's Kansas City Chiefs are 1-6-1, but the soft-spoken owner says he has no plans to make any quick coaching changes.

"I think they're pretty darn well coached," Hunt said Sunday after the Detroit Lions squeezed out a 7-6 victory. The Chiefs, 5-17-1 under Frank Gansz, have lost three games by one point and haven't scored a rushing touchdown all season. Against the lowly Lions, they managed only 171 total yards.

"When you can be competitive at 7-6, 7-6, 24-23 and 6-3, that sounds reasonably competitive," Hunt said. "But (we're not well enough coached to get that next step, because of 12-7 today, it was 7-6, so we weren't well enough coached to win this game."

The Chiefs have made five coaching changes since 1974 but Hunt bristled at the suggestion another change could be imminent.

"That's a very cruel judgment that comes down to winning and losing, and that's inevitably the way it is, and that's the way we'll look at it," Hunt said. "We'll look at it as a season; not on an individual game basis."

Hunt answered sharply when asked if that meant he would make no change "under any circumstances."

"I didn't hear anybody ask that," he said. "It's not a proper question. We're going to evaluate the season when it's over."

Gansz replaced John Mackovic after Mackovic's 1986 team made the Chiefs' first playoff appearance since 1971.

Brown leaves hospital

SAN ANTONIO — San Antonio Spurs coach Larry Brown has left Humana Hospital, still not knowing what caused the severe headaches and ear problems that have afflicted him the past four or five months.

Brown, who left the hospital Saturday, said he will undergo more tests at Humana as an out-patient this week. Brown said doctors did not find a cyst in his skull area during tests Friday.

Brown, 47, said he will undergo more tests Monday and Tuesday at Humana. He underwent a spinal tap Friday morning. He missed the NBA exhbition game Friday night in Fred Bramlage Coliseum between the Spurs and the Dallas Mavericks.

Celtics win tournament

MADRID, Spain — Larry Bird scored eight points to lead a 22-5 fourth-quarter surge and the Boston Celtics brought their winning tradition overseas, beating tournament host Real Madrid 111-96 Sunday in the championship of the McDonald's Basketball Open.

The Celtics, 16-time NBA champions, were playing in the first major NBA-sponsored event outside the United States. In a consolation game played earlier Sunday, the Yugoslavian national team beat Italian league champion Scavolini Pesaro 100-91.

Bird showed the form that has made him a three-time Most Valuable Player in the NBA, leading all scorers with 29 points, adding 12 assists and contributing a key steal during Boston's fourth quarter streak.

Athletes may be punished

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — U.S.-based track and field athletes who easily beat their internationally isolated local competition and set several South African records in a three-meet series will face a tougher test when they return home.

The Athletics Congress, the sport's governing body in the United States, has scheduled a Nov. 18 hearing in Chicago to discuss punishment for the 13 team members for violating an international boycott against competition in South Africa.

The South Africans, who hadn't participated in international competition since 1976, benefited from the tour, steadily improving their performances.

The U.S. team included some Olympians, past and present, plus collegians.

Vienna Choir Boys sell out McCain

By Tom McLaughlin
Collegian Reviewer

The Vienna Boys Choir, which celebrates its 500th anniversary this year, was received by a sell-out crowd Sunday at McCain Auditorium.

Before the performance, the audience hummed with anticipation and several would-be patrons were turned away at the box office.

Concert Review

It became clear that the choir members have been received enthusiastically throughout the United States in the past 56 years not because of their sailor-suit costumes or their boyish innocence, but because of their reputation as an ensemble of wonderful singers.

As the curtain was slowly raised, I was surprised to see only 20 boys standing in a semi-circle around a baby grand piano.

My wonder as to how this group could possibly fill McCain with sound was quickly dispelled as the boys, under the direction of conductor Stephan Aichinger, sang a fluid rendition of Baldassare Galuppi's "Dixit Dominus."

Joseph Haydn's "Abendgebet" also displayed the group's talent as the choir's resonance lingered almost in mid-air of the large auditorium.

Not quite so impressive was the group's choice of Heiller's dissonant "Ave Maria."

Although the choir members were cherubic in their performance of the song, the piece itself left much to be desired.

The group showcased their talent in a layered and rich interpretation of Heinz Kratochwil's "Jubilate Deo." They not only created rhythmic rounds of echoing in the song but captured the jumping, upbeat tempo with sporadic bursts of vocal expression.

The not-so-short pause between "Jubilate Deo" and Jean Baptist Klerr's operetta "Theaterg'Schichten" slowed down the continuity of the performance.

Although quite humorous in spots, the operetta was the least effective portion of the concert, due to chaotic and ineffective staging.

It seemed as though the boys had been given little direction in terms of stage movement and, as a result, the stage pictures they created were not nearly as succinct or as effective as they should have been.

A refreshing component of the operetta was the costuming, which dressed the youngsters in powdered wigs and colorful, period male and female costumes.

Following an intermission, the group performed a delightful acapella version of Franz Schubert's soothing "Natchelle."

The group's depth and breadth became clear as they performed two Austrian folksongs which showed their ability to communicate, albeit in German, the similarity of the human condition around the world.

The language barrier was broken by the mellow and upbeat folksongs.

The closing montage of Johann Strauss polkas and waltzes built to a thunderous explosion of applause from the audience.

The audience called the choir back for three encores.

Mothers call survey questions offensive

By The Associated Press

CHARLESTON, W.Va. — A state paternity survey that asks for intimate details of a welfare mother's sex life is so intrusive it's offensive, a legal aid lawyer says.

One federal official said such surveys are discouraged.

Human Services Department officials confirm that the survey asks women for the exact dates when sexual relations between them and the childrens' alleged fathers began and ended, according to the Charleston Sunday Gazette-Mail.

Other questions include: "Is there anyone else who could possibly be the father of the child? Did the child's father ever suggest an abortion? How often did you have sexual relations with him?"

"Why don't I just put a video camera in my bedroom," one unidentified woman complained to the newspaper.

Employment outlook positive through 1988, survey reveals

By Angela Smith
Collegian Reporter

The positive hiring outlook that has prevailed during 1988 will continue through the year's end, according to a survey of nearly 14,000 companies conducted by Manpower Inc., a worldwide temporary help service.

The quarterly nationwide survey indicates 28 percent of the firms interviewed plan to increase employment during the final quarter, while eight percent plan cutbacks and 61 percent will maintain present levels. Three percent are not yet certain of their employment plans.

The job outlook for K-Staters looks good, said Bruce Laughlin, director of the Career Planning and Placement Center.

The most recent unemployment figures showed a marginal increase, and current survey results indicate that hiring activity will remain strong through the last quarter of the year, said Mitchell Fromstein, chief executive at Manpower.

The Manpower surveys are accurate, Laughlin said.

"I'm sure Manpower has a large enough sampling and any comments they make are credible," Laughlin said.

He said K-State students have a great chance of finding a job after graduation.

"I think the job market is quite positive and the evidence now (suggests) it will be slightly improved over last year," Laughlin said.

Amy Vath, senior in industrial engineering, said she is optimistic about the job market.

"People should just have fun with interviews and let their personality shine," Vath said.

Kathleen Gentry, student recruiter and staff accountant for the accounting firm Ernst and Whinney, said she also sees a positive job outlook for K-State students.

"K-State has always been a prime source of top-quality individuals recruited by Ernst and Whinney. Over the years, we have been fortunate enough to hire students who seem to meet our needs," Gentry said. "This year, we hope to add more numbers to our staff through K-State."

Many students are optimistic about finding a job after graduation.

"The job market is good, but very competitive," said Don Martin, senior in marketing.

Brad Rebel, senior in accounting and finance, said a good grade point average is important.

"The job market looks great if you have an acceptable GPA. The GPA will get your foot in the door, and once you are in the door, the job will be there," Rebel said.

Illiteracy highest in South

By The Associated Press

MACON, Ga. — Afraid of being left behind economically and culturally, this central Georgia city is mobilizing for battle. The enemy is illiteracy.

And Macon is not alone, as communities all over the South are waking up to the dollars-and-cents drawbacks of illiteracy.

One of every three Macon adults is considered to be functionally illiterate, the highest rate in the nation for a city with more than 100,000 people, according to the U.S. Census Bureau.

"We're supposed to have a 37 percent illiteracy rate," said Cheryl Kelly, the director of Project Read in Macon. "We know we've got a big problem here, but the truth is we're not all that much different from the rest of the state, or the region, for that matter."

Aimed at adults who either read poorly or not at all, Project Read has a $350,000 war chest, including a $100,000 Knight Foundation grant and $46,000 from the Junior League of Macon. Project Read is one of several ambitious undertakings in which public and private sectors have joined forces to help Southerners learn to read.

Bush advertising reverses ratings

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Republican George Bush is running an advertising campaign so successful that it has overshadowed news events and swayed voters in a near-vacuum that Democrat Michael Dukakis only now is moving to fill.

With the Nov. 8 election little more than two weeks away, Dukakis went on the air during the weekend with strong counter-punches to a months-old Bush offensive that raked him over the coals — often inaccurately — and obliterated any momentum the Massachusetts governor had leaving the Democratic convention in July.

For his part, Bush has used TV ads to reinforce the "I share your values, he doesn't" campaign message he has delivered in stump speeches across the country.

The results have been dramatic.

West Stadium deteriorating

By Theresa Luling
Collegian Reporter

The condition of West Stadium "will take someone getting killed to get (it) some attention," said Charles Stroh, head of the Department of Art.

Constructed in 1923 and badly in need of fire-code renovation, West Stadium houses painting, ceramic and sculpture classes. The Purple Masque theater and the K-State Police are located in East Stadium, which was completed in 1924.

The uses of the building, particularly West Stadium, have changed over the years, Stroh said. In the past, the facility was home for the football team. The men lived in rooms on the second floor.

Now these rooms are studios for art students.

Stroh said he is concerned for the safety of the students who use the facilty.

"It (West Stadium) was not intended to be used for classes," Stroh said. "The building has deteriorated and has not been taken care of.

"Let me tell you something crazy. Until last year, both of the fire exit doors had dead bolts on the inside so no one could get in."

The dead bolts have been replaced with panic bars, but Stroh said he is not satisfied.

"We are dealing with people's lives," Stroh said. "If a major fire were to take place on the second floor, some students might not get out.

"First of all, there are no fire alarms," he said. "So the possibility of someone getting caught on second floor unaware of the fire is feasible.

"If you are standing in the middle of the second floor hallway, vision is restricted," Stroh said. "You cannot see the two exits. The smoke from the fire could impair the student's vision and the paper and wood signs being used to indicate the exits would be impossible to locate."

The upstairs hallway acts like a chimney flue, allowing the smoke and heat a means of escape, he said.

Because West Stadium was not designed to house an academic department, several inherent design problems exist within the physical structure.

Poor ventilation is another hazard that Stroh said worries him.

A total of 12 fire extinguisher stalls are in West Stadium. As of Oct. 19, there were two fire extinguishers missing from their stalls and two extinguishers with their safety pins pulled and showing low pressure, indicating they could not be used to fight a fire.

Judge to hear prison case

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Lawyers are expected to ask a federal judge this morning to order the state to remove inmates from a Hutchinson prison and to limit the number of inmates the state can put in another, northeast Kansas prison.

Lawyers for inmates at the Kansas State Industrial Reformatory in Hutchinson plan to try to show that overcrowded conditions there violate prisoners' constitutional rights. A lawyer for inmates at the Kansas Correctional Institution at Lansing is expected to ask the court to prevent overcrowding there.

U.S. District Judge Richard Rogers of Topeka has scheduled three days of hearings, starting at 9:30 a.m. today. Both sides in the case acknowledge the case could remain active for several years and will affect the entire operation of the prison system.

The current litigation stems from a 1978 lawsuit brought by inmates at a third prison, the Kansas State Penitentiary.

Contras fading into history

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Contras, the Nicaraguan rebels President Reagan lauded as "freedom fighters" and made the centerpiece of his Central America policy, are fading into history.

Supporters and opponents alike say the rebels, who once claimed to be inflicting severe damage on the leftist Sandinista regime through their forays inside Nicaragua, now are little more than refugees huddled in camps along the Honduran border.

"Every single Contra who died, died for nothing, it turns out," said Rep. Mickey Edwards, R-Okla., who has led a losing battle in the House of Representatives to win military aid for the rebels.

Reagan's personal devotion to the Contras has largely sustained them since they were formed in 1981.

Only 175 banks made Money Magazine's list of Safest Banks in the U.S.
Only five of those were Kansas banks.
And only one of those was from Northeast Kansas:

Union National Bank & Trust

Following a stringent financial evaluation that took into account the asset size and service spectrum of each bank, UNB was evaluated and selected by Money Magazine as one of the nation's safest from an original list of over 14,000 banks.

why meat has an iridescence which produces yellow, green or other colors that consumers confuse with bacterial contamination, Unruh said.

Melvin Hunt, professor of animal sciences and industry, and James Claus, graduate student in food science, are researching low-fat bologna and ground beef.

Spray chilling of commercial beef slaughter, which involves spraying cold water on chilled carcasses, is tested for reducing evaporative losses during chilling.

The Weber addition provides specialized research labs for areas the department did not have before, such as microbiology, embryology, and a culture lab, said Duane Davis, associate professor of animal sciences and industry.

"Today, they rolled the carcasses into the classroom," said John Fox, who graduated in animal sciences and industry. "When I was here in 1959, the facilities were new, but students stood in the coolers and shivered during the observations."

Vicki Goertzen, who also graduated in animal science and industry, said she had to watch the slaughter on films during the renovation.

"We observed the same procedures in the cooler of Pittman, crammed and shivering," Goetrzen said. "It was hard to pay attention because it was so cold. Often the instructors gave us a break to warm up in the hallway.

"Now, the kids going through the program will be highly marketable. Studying in the facility will be a great experience for incoming students, and the industry is excited to see the quality and innovation of the program."

During the dedication, Wayne and Elizabeth Rogler were recognized for their $100,000 gift to the Livestock Meat and Industry Council.

Renovated hall honors former dean

By Lisa Pfannenstiel
Collegian Reporter

K-State has re-established a facility worthy of "Dad" Weber's name, Sen. Ross Doyen said to the audience and members of Arthur D. Weber's family during the dedication of the renovated Weber Hall facility.

The facility was named in honor of Weber, former head of the Department of Animal Husbandry and former Dean of the College of Agriculture.

Thirteen members of the Weber family attended the event.

"He was a wonderful brother," Maybelle Post said, with her hand propped under her tiny nose. She paused. Her glassy eyes widened and her face wrinkled with 82 years of age as she smiled and continued.

"(Weber) associated with anybody — rich or poor," she said. "K-State was his entire life. He and his wife didn't have kids, so the animal sciences was his most important project in life.

"He didn't want people to brag about him. He would have thought today's (dedication) was an unnecessary big to-do, even though he would have been very proud of the new building."

"Uncle Arthur had humble dignity," said Linda Frazee, Weber's great-niece and graduate in veterinary medicine. "He spent time in India (to review the agriculture program between K-State and India), but no one would have known it because he didn't talk about himself."

Weber could foresee the needs and changes of the meat industry, and few people have that extraordinary vision, Frazee said.

Weber's goals were apparent early in his life. He forecasted his life's ambitions in a high school composition, said Art Post, Weber's nephew.

"(Weber) wanted to be the finest ambassador for the rural young farmer. He wanted people to believe by observing the example he set, the good life he lived," Post said.

Charlotte Pike, Weber's niece, said she remembers when Weber's picture was hung in Chicago for the International Livestock Show in 1954. He was the first American to judge livestock in England and South America.

"There is so much I'd like to ask him if he were still here, so much I wish I could know," Frazee said.

Maybelle Post said she really started to know Weber when he entered the kitchen as she cooked and said, "We'll have some kitchen-talk."

"We didn't know him as Arthur Weber, but as Dad Weber," Post said. "He was born when Dewey was running for President. Every boy on the block had the middle name Dewey, so Mom decided to not have a middle name, just the initial 'D.' During his first year in college at K-State, Weber's friend said he could not go without a middle name. Everyone had a middle name. His friend began calling him 'Dad' — since then he hasn't been known as Arthur, but 'Dad' Weber."

Meinhardt eyes 2nd district seat

By Sarah Kobs
Collegian Reporter

Editor's note: This is part seven of a series on the candidates for the Kansas Legislature.

Republican Phil Meinhardt believes he has the necessary experience and knowledge to serve Kansans from the 2nd District in the U.S. House of Representatives.

He is a native of Wabaunsee County and resides in Topeka, said Glen Hanson, Meinhardt's campaign consultant. After serving in the military for 34 years and living around the world, Meinhardt chose to return to Kansas upon retirement.

Hanson said Meinhardt's experience in the military has given him a solid background in national economy, government and technology.

"He has participated regularly in the economic policies of the military," Hanson said.

Meinhardt attended the U.S. Naval Academy Prep School and graduated from the U.S. Air Force Academy in 1960 with a bachelor's degree in general engineering. He received a master's degree in business from UCLA in 1975, Hanson said.

Dennis Marten, Meinhardt's campaign director in Manhattan, said Meinhardt's first goal concerning government spending is reducing the deficit.

Meinhardt said his opponent, incumbent Jim Slattery, is "clearly in favor of raising taxes" to reduce the deficit. Controlling government spending is the solution Meinhardt supports.

"Phil supports (Nancy) Kassebaum's proposal to freeze government spending until we get a handle on the deficit," Marten said.

Meinhardt said the budget could be balanced in two years if there was a freeze on government spending. He wouldn't decrease current budgets, but new government programs would be delayed until the deficit was reduced, he said.

"We need to improve efficiencies within the old programs before we start new ones using borrowed money," he said.

Federally funded student loans and scholarships would be one of Meinhardt's top priorities once the deficit was reduced, Marten said.

"Meinhardt has personally benefitted from federal funding (for education); he feels education programs are a good investment," Hanson said.

Meinhardt has lived all over the world and in countries with legalized drugs. He feels legalizing drugs is a "dumb notion," Hanson said.

"Phil feels it doesn't enhance society at all. Instead, it poses a new raft of problems," Hanson said.

Meinhardt said he is capable of representing Kansas constituents on national issues.

"I've had a tremendous education in technology and graduated at the top of my class in economics," he said.

While he was in the Air Force, he had experience dealing with national defense and helped with three studies concerning the Strategic Defense Initiative.

"In regard to defense, Eisenhower is my hero. He held the defense budget to $36 billion. Today it is over $300 billion, and I'm not convinced we're any safer," Meinhardt said.

Marten said one of Meinhardt's goals is to improve ethics in Congress. Laws for the executive branch of Congress are stricter than for any other. Meinhardt wants to see this change, with laws becoming stricter for all members of Congress, he said.

On Monday, Meinhardt will be in Manhattan to speak at the Manhattan Kiwanis Club meeting.

fans in Minnesota's Metrodome were truly the difference in 1987, giving the Twins the edge they needed to down St. Louis. I couldn't have cared less who won the Series, but the roar of the crowd at that Series was something I'd never seen before. It was awesome.

And yet the best, it seems, may have been a moment we've just witnessed — one that typifies what captivates me so much about the grand old game.

With Los Angeles trailing Oakland 4-3 in the ninth inning of Game 1 of the 1988 Series, Kirk Gibson moved to the plate as the Dodgers' final hope.

He was facing the Athletics' Dennis Eckersley, the top relief pitcher in the majors, and he was doing it on two bad legs. Both hamstrings and both knees were hurt, but Gibson, a gamer from the word "go," moved to the plate for the ultimate confrontation.

It was a confrontation Gibson won on sheer guts, and a triumph of the human spirit.

Gibson, using basically only his arms, simply reached out and guided the ball into the stands in right for a two-run, game-winning home run.

The sight of Gibson, with the typical two-day growth on his face, hobbling around the bases while frantically pumping his arms into the air, brought a tear to the eye of any true baseball fan.

It was Roy Hobbs in "The Natural." It was you in your own private dream.

It was one moment in time, when an athlete, a human being, was more than he — or anyone else — thought he could be.

griddle over the fire. A pot of water was hung from a horizontal bar over the fire to make another staple of the soldier's meal — hot coffee.

Krause flipped the jacks while Trooper, Smith's dalmation, inspected breakfast. Krause said he feared that some of the flapjacks would burn, thus becoming "Trooper bait."

Although the early-morning temperatures dipped into the 40's Sunday, there were few complaints from the troops.

"All uniforms were wool back then, and so are what we wear, except for the cotton shirts worn under the jackets," said Dave Robinson, a Lawrence insurance salesman and cavalry private.

Most of the clothes and cavalry gear are bought from specialty suppliers in Mississippi that produce era reproductions for the many re-enactment groups across the country.

"We try to study everything involved with the era, right down to how they wore the uniform and how they cooked the food," Robinson said.

To say that re-enacting history is expensive is an understatement. A fully equipped cavalryman can spend around $1,200 for the basics.

analyze what needs to be done."

Becky Thessing, sophomore in architecture, has started a petition in order to get better lighting on campus.

"I heard some rumors about attacks (at night on campus) and found out they were never reported. Nothing was ever done about it," Thessing said.

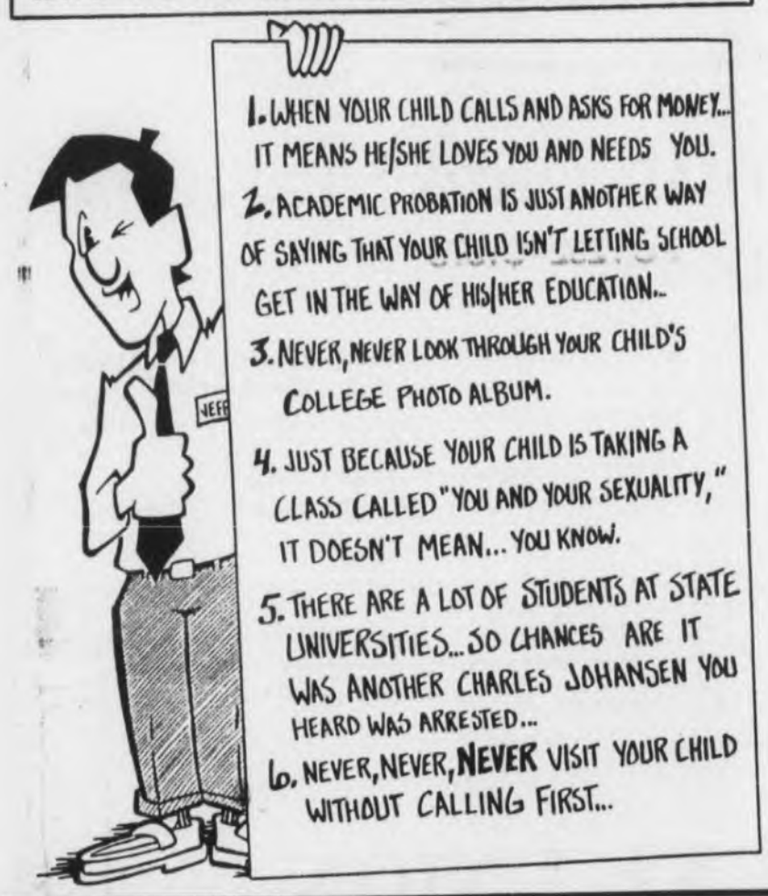
After Thessing heard the rumors, she decided to start a petition to get the outdoor lighting improved, she said. After organizing the petition, she contacted Mark Lapping, dean of the College of Architecture and Design.

She said Lapping suggested that "I try the whole campus."

The petition calls for more lighting in the areas of Seaton Hall and Seaton Court to Farrell Library and along Mid-Campus Drive near Willard Hall. Thessing said she chose these areas because of the rumors of recent attacks.

Thessing asks the person to whom she is presenting the petition, "If they know where a place needs more lighting to draw a map of the area."

Thessing has taken her petition to a recent Hall Governing Board meeting in Ford Hall and also to an Association of Residence Halls meeting where she got permission to post the petition. She has also sent the petition to a Panhellenic Council meeting to help sororities become more aware of the problem.



Thessing said she hopes to contact the fraternities to give them information on the lighting situation.

Although many of the residence halls have an escort service, some students have complained about the program.

For example, Thessing said, "Some don't want to wait. One girl had to wait an hour for an escort. Also, many students don't have any idea when they'll be done on campus. This poses a problem because you're supposed to make arrangements in advance to use the service."

$6.9 million plan approved

By Amy Rosebrough
Collegian Reporter

After 12 months of hashing through alternate plans by the K-State Housing Council, housing officials have accepted a $6.9 million renovation plan for Van Zile, Putnam and Boyd residence halls.

"It is not feasible to reconstruct only Van Zile," said Robert Krause, vice president for institutional advancement. "We would still have to deal with Putnam and Boyd."

Because the demolition of Van Zile would be expensive, the renovation plan including all three buildings is the best alternative for consolidation of space and money, he said.

Jack Watson, Department of Housing employee, estimates $1 million will be needed to get Van Zile up to Life Safety Code standards.

The submitted proposal will include $4 million for the reconstruction. Van Zile, K-State's oldest residence hall, was closed in 1984 because of structural problems with the roof and plumbing facilities.

Watson said any building deteriorates 50 percent faster when it is not occupied. He believes this is part of the reason why so much money must be spent to repair the hall.

The first floors of Putnam and Boyd will be renovated and air-conditioning will be installed throughout the three halls.

Although renovation plans will benefit students living in Boyd and Putnam, not all aspects of the construction are receiving student support. Ellen Ellis, senior in fisheries and wildlife biology, opposes the installation of air-conditioning in the residence halls.

"I am not a proponent of adding air-conditioning to Van Zile and Boyd because it would ruin the design of the (residential halls)," she said. "Boyd and Putnam were designed for air passage, unlike Ford, so there is ventilation."

The planned construction also includes connecting the three halls by corridors and locating a central food service in Van Zile.

Krause said the University will keep with historical preservation by using limestone for the exterior.

There are two problems under advisement for the complex proposal — the method of disposal of asbestos used as insulation in Van Zile and available parking facilities around the halls.

Krause said both of these matters are being addressed by University officials.

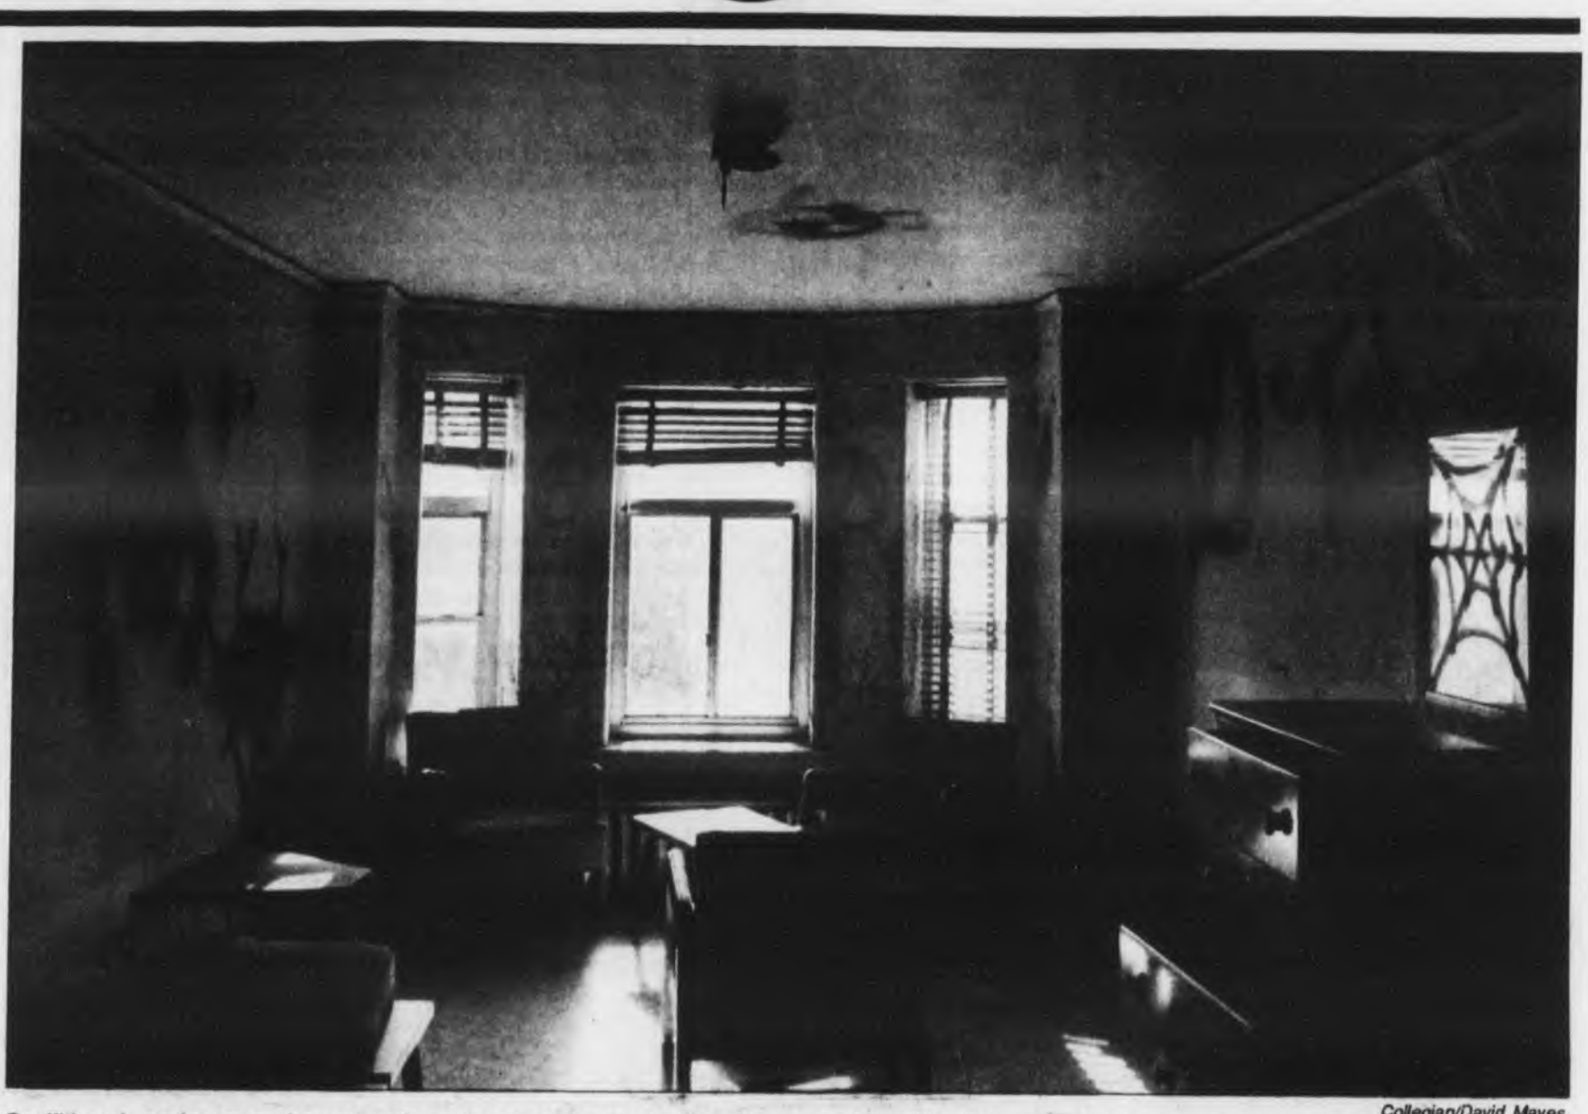
"We have a parking report coming," he said. "Obviously, there is a parking problem throughout the University."

The proposal will go to the Kansas Board of Regents in November. The time it takes for the regents to approve the plan will depend on the number of similar proposals currently before the board.

If it approves the plan, the Housing Council will bring the architectural plans to the regents for approval, Krause said. If the council stays on target, renovation will be complete in late summer or fall of 1989, he said.

The main source of funding for the renovation of these residence halls will come from bonds, which will be sold on the open market with a guaranteed return. Krause said they will probably be 20-year bonds.

Under this proposal, all K-State students living in residence halls will help finance the renovation plan. The students will pay for the financing of the bonds through a fee applied to room and board charges.



"It has been this way in the past," Krause said. "The people in Putnam helped pay for the air-conditioning in Ford Hall."

Another portion of the $6.9 million will come from existing funds. Krause estimated this amount to be about $2 million.

Although K-State does not have the money set aside, Krause said the money could be saved by the time it is needed.

The time from conception to completion of this plan is short, Krause said, but this could be a factor in

Campus departments adapt building spaces

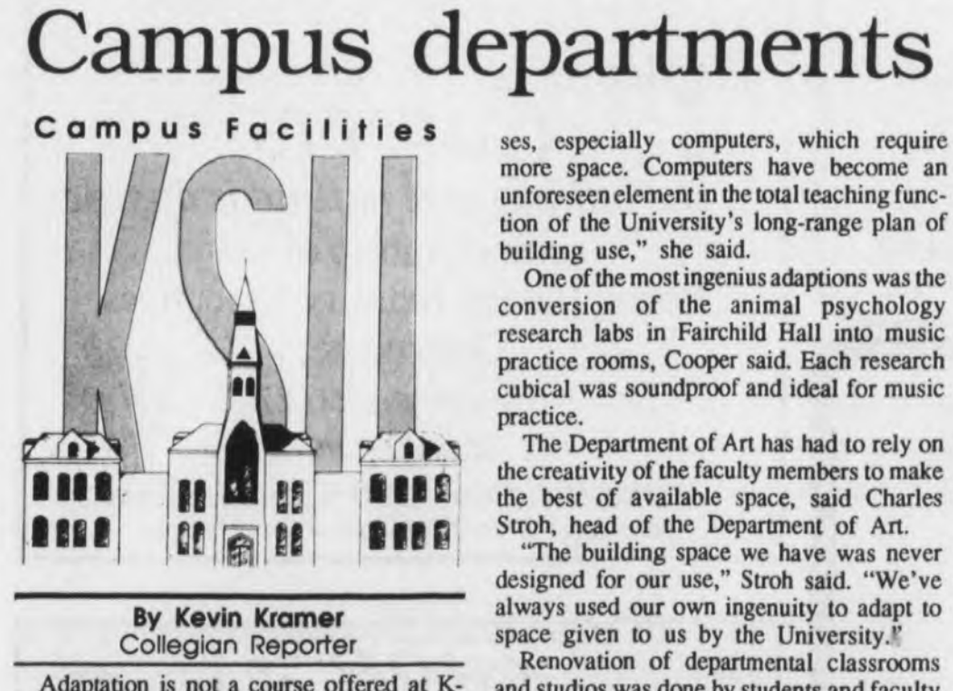
By Kevin Kramer
Collegian Reporter

Adaptation is not a course offered at K-State, but rather a way of life for campus departments trying to use limited space.

"University departments are very ingenius in their use of space," said Helen Cooper, management analyst for facilities planning. "Departments adapt and readapt to every available square foot of space on campus.

"There has been a shift in the mode of teaching at K-State. There are more lab classes, especially computers, which require more space. Computers have become an unforeseen element in the total teaching function of the University's long-range plan of building use," she said.

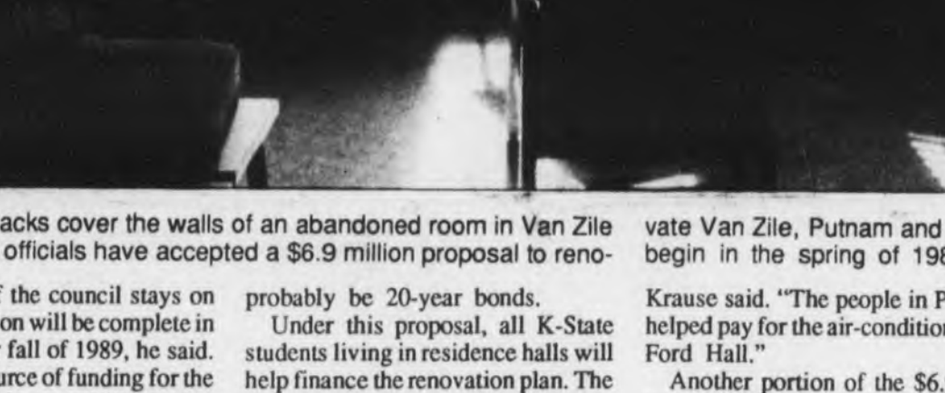
One of the most ingenius adaptions was the conversion of the animal psychology research labs in Fairchild Hall into music practice rooms, Cooper said. Each research cubical was soundproof and ideal for music practice.



The Department of Art has had to rely on the creativity of the faculty members to make the best of available space, said Charles Stroh, head of the Department of Art.

"The building space we have was never designed for our use," Stroh said. "We've always used our own ingenuity to adapt to space given to us by the University."

Renovation of departmental classrooms and studios was done by students and faculty members without University assistance, he said.



Some of the faculty studio space in Burt Hall, which has concrete floors and drains and at one time was animal research stalls, is ideal for art activities, Stroh said.

"The Art Building was originally designed as a dairy barn, then it was a chemical engineering facility, and when no one else could use it, the art department got it," Stroh said.

Staff/Mike Venso

Elliot Pujol's metalsmithing and jewelry class has a problem with overcrowding. The class has as many as 20 people in a room with an occupancy limit of 15.

A number of criteria are used to determine the use of campus building space, including: immediate and future needs, location, type of space, long-range plans for the University and department and the desire to keep departments together, Cooper said.

"The University's frame of mind is often more negative than positive when it comes to giving space to the art department," Stroh said. "If nobody else needs, or could use the space, it lets the art department have it."

The Department of Art teaches classes in six buildings: the Art Building, West Stadium, Bluemont Hall, Umberger Hall, Denison Hall and Burt Hall. The majority of art classes are in the Art Building, West Stadium and Bluemont.

The Art Building provides space for teaching nine disciplines — printmaking, metals and jewelry, art education, three-dimensional design, weaving, art history, graphic design, photography and watercolor, he said.

"One of the biggest space problems we have is the use of the drawing and design rooms in Bluemont Hall," Stroh said. "The rooms are scheduled with classes from 8:30 a.m. to 5:30 p.m., five days a week, making the studios impossible for student use outside of class time," he said.

Space is a serious issue facing a number of departments, said Marvin Kaiser, acting associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

"We are finding a mixed bag of problems in regard to space," he said. "Some departments appear to be in fairly good shape in quality and quantity, and others are at the other extreme — classrooms with ceiling tiles falling out and paint peeling off the walls."

The College of Arts and Sciences is focusing its attention on the identified needs and deficiencies of faculty office space, inadequate classroom space and facilities with safety problems, he said.

"I can't explain the deficit end of the finding," Kaiser said. "Some departments have better quality and quantity of space due to the accidents of history — moving to a new building."

Problems are resulting in departments with faculty offices and studios spread among several buildings on campus, he said. Faculty members are having a difficult time trying to contact each other and their students.

"We have four to six faculty members sharing an office in one department," Kaiser said. "Some of those faculty members are even sharing the same desks.

"How and where do faculty members work privately with students, keep regular office hours or do any research and writing? If the Program assists center

By Audra Dietz
Staff Writer

Gov. Mike Hayden announced Monday a new regional alcohol and drug abuse treatment center will be opened in Manhattan, with the help of a $166,000 grant.

The Northeast Regional Prevention Center will be dedicated by Hayden at 10 a.m. Saturday at 2001 Claflin Road, the site of Pawnee Mental Health Center. The prevention center will expand the current center's services.

The grant was awarded by the governor's "Toward a Drug-Free Kansas" program.

The center's only competition for the grant was K-State. Hayden chose the prevention center as the recipient over K-State in September. K-State's drug awareness program has received no funds from the governor's drug-free program.

The center is one of seven regional prevention centers in Kansas. It will serve 13 surrounding counties, including Riley County, said Beth Hughes, program coordinator for the Northeast Kansas Prevention Center.

"This will serve as a prevention center to promote community awareness of drug abuse, and reduce alcohol and drug abuse among youth," she said.

The center will also provide assistance to other community intervention and treatment programs in northeast Kansas.

"We will work with community intervention and treatment services so that youth who are identified as abusing drugs can receive help," Hughes said in an earlier statement.

The center will also help community organizations that want to start drug

Bears invade Japanese towns

TOKYO — Bears have invaded towns in western Japan to search for food, and residents have been told to carry whistles and bells and play radios to scare them away.

Residents of Toyama, a state about 160 miles west of Tokyo, have seen more than 30 bears foraging through towns, said Minoru Arakawa, a spokesman for the state. Nine of the animals were killed or captured this month.

Officials said this year's sparse crop of the wild fruit the bears eat in their mountain habitat drove the animals toward residential areas.

Authorities have told people to throw hats or other clothes on the ground to divert the attention of bears they may encounter.

BRIEFLY ACROSS THE NATION

Whales head wrong way

BARROW, Alaska — Two Soviet icebreakers steamed toward U.S. waters to join the drive to save two stranded whales Monday, while rescuers appeared to lose ground in their efforts to coax the imprisoned mammals toward freedom.

Biologists stopped cutting new breathing holes through the Beaufort Sea ice Monday evening after the whales, apparently spooked by a shoal, headed back toward the shoreline where they have been trapped for more than two weeks.

With Eskimo crews providing the backbreaking labor, biologists switched tactics in the frustrating effort to get the whales through the shallow water.

First, they connected a series of intermittent breathing holes to form a single open channel some 600 yards long.

Instead of pushing the ice blocks back under the adjacent ice, the Eskimos used long poles to guide the miniature icebergs to the rear of the slot.

The idea was to try to keep the whales from reversing their course toward the nearest open water.

Initially the strategy worked. The whales would swim back and forth between the edge of the shoal and the rear of the ice-clogged channel.

"They're doing what they're supposed to," said federal whale biologist David Withrow, as the back-filling operation forced the whales toward the shoal.

But when the channel behind them was almost completely filled, the whales reversed course, struggling up through the large slabs of ice and thick slush.

"It's discouraging," Withrow said as the whales began surfacing farther and farther back from the shoal. "Why come back here when they know it's open up there?"

Nation's hens work harder

WASHINGTON — The nation's hens shelled out an estimated 5.55 billion eggs last month, down 2 percent from September 1987, the Agriculture Department said Monday.

But there were 3 percent fewer hens in laying flocks in September — an estimated average of 272 million birds during the month, compared with 281 million a year ago, the department said in its monthly report.

Thus, each hen worked harder, averaging 2,037 eggs per 100 layers, up from 2,024 eggs in September 1987, the report said.

Cartoons focus on homeless

WASHINGTON — The tragedy of homelessness will be featured in graphic style in the nation's newspapers today, as more than 100 cartoonists dedicate their work to that national problem.

Both comic-strip and editorial cartoonists are joining the effort, including some of the best-known panels and strips, said Barry Zigas of the National Low Income Housing Coalition.

"Hunger and homelessness are not partisan issues, they are human tragedies that deserve our immediate attention," Zigas said at a news conference announcing the project.

Similar news conferences were scheduled in 22 other cities across the nation in an effort to focus attention on hunger and homelessness, he said.

Zigas, noting that there are no official counts of the number of homeless, said national estimates range from 350,000 to more than 3 million.

U.N. celebrates anniversary

UNITED NATIONS — The United Nations celebrated the 43rd anniversary of its charter Monday with a U.N. Day peace walk in the rose garden of the New York headquarters and praise of the world organization's peacekeeping efforts.

The celebration followed a weekend rebuff by the U.S. Senate that rejected a Reagan administration request for $150 million to help support current or anticipated U.N. peacekeeping efforts in Afghanistan, the Persian Gulf and southern Africa.

Some senators said they were not satisfied, despite administration assurances, that U.S. aid to anti-Marxist rebels in Angola would continue.

Washington has been withholding regular dues to compel the United Nations to make budgetary and political reforms. That has made the United States, which is assessed 25 percent of the budget, the largest debtor to the United Nations but still its largest contributor.

On Oct. 14, the United States paid $85.6 million in back dues, reducing its regular-budget arrears to $366.3 million. It is withholding another $59 million until the main U.N. financial committee adopts austerity measures.

U.N. officials had little to say Monday about the Senate action.

"There is no reaction," said Francois Giuliani, spokesman for Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar.

Masked men rob bank

ELWOOD — Two men wearing Halloween monster masks and carrying guns robbed a bank Monday in Elwood in Doniphan County, authorities said.

The suspects, both described as white, 6 feet tall and average build, were thought to be traveling in a red Oldsmobile with Nebraska tags, along with another man, according to Max Geiman, special agent for the FBI in Kansas City.

Two men walked into the First State Bank in Elwood about 11:45 a.m., one carrying a shotgun and the other a handgun, Geiman said. They carried white bags and took bills from teller drawers and the bank's vault.

Geiman would not say how much money was taken.

The men then drove away in a black car that was recovered shortly afterward in a private shed in Elwood. The men were seen getting into the red, late-model Oldsmobile. Authorities also recovered one of the monster masks at the shed.

Geiman said the black car had been stolen earlier that morning from a used-car dealer in St. Joseph, Mo., which is just across the Missouri River from Elwood.

Company controls campus' pests

By Alan Wilds
Collegian Reporter

An occasional bug seen scampering underneath a desk or table on campus need not alarm students. It could be any of a number of pests that are commonly seen in University buildings, said officials from the Department of Campus Safety.

Carl Kunish, campus sanitarian, said roaches, ground beetles, spiders, crickets and even rodents are reported to him on a regular basis.

"It is not unusual to receive a mouse complaint," he said.

Kunish said, his department receives an average of 400 complaint forms a year and categorizes them on a month-to-month basis to determine problem areas.

The number of complaints each year could easily be cut in half if the University had a crew to do the exterminating, he said.

"Roaches seem to be a problem around student and faculty break areas," Kunish said, and ants have been a problem in Seaton Hall.

"Warm weather is also very conducive to insect life," he said.

Robert Helgesen, head of the entomology department, said the way bugs gain access to buildings depends on the type of insect, type of activity in the building and the building's construction.

"Ants can be subterranean so they can get into buildings through cracks in the foundation or through windows and doors above ground level," Helgesen said.

Roaches will not enter underground, he said. Instead, they find their way in when people enter the building carrying roach-infested material, such as boxes that have been in storage.

"Once roaches are in a building, it is very hard to get rid of them," Helgesen said.

All exterminating on campus is contracted with American Pest Management Inc. of Manhattan. Kunish said the company inspects and treats the campus monthly. Then, he meets with the exterminators to review complaint forms and determine their progress.

"If their inspections are done properly, they should find the things that need to be done," Kunish said.

The report from American Pest Management on the September inspection and treatment said that new pesticides showed effective reduction of insects in vulnerable areas. Seaton and Eisenhower Hall were treated for ants, while Jardine Terrace and Moore, Marlatt and Edwards halls were treated for general pest control.

Derby, Kramer, Boyd and Smurthwaite food centers were treated for general pests and flies.

The exterminating is financed by the Department of Public Safety, and the average monthly cost is about $1,000, Kunish said. That total excludes exterminating in the residence halls and food centers, which is paid for by the Department of Housing.

Lecturer criticizes Nixon's war policies

By The Collegian Staff

"All names on the left-hand side of the Vietnam Memorial, in Washington D.C., died while Nixon was Chief of Staff. They died after he decided the war could not be won," Steven Ambrose said.

Stating that he would have pulled the American troops out of Vietnam in 1969 instead of 1973, Ambrose, military historian and professor at the University of New Orleans, delivered the third biennial Dwight D. Eisenhower Lecture Monday night in Forum Hall.

Ambrose, a known critic of Nixon's policies during the Vietnam War, said that Nixon had wanted a retreat while Lyndon Johnson was in office, but later changed his mind due to the Tet offensive in the fall of 1968.

"Nixon was fighting a war while retreating, with no attempt at winning, but refusing to admit the country had lost," he said.

Ambrose resigned his teaching position at K-State in 1971 soon after President Nixon gave a Landon Lecture. Ambrose was angered by Nixon's view that he could deliver a lecture at K-State and not meet opposition to his ideas, said Kent Donovan, professor of history. A panel discussion on Ambrose's controversial resignation will be at 3 p.m. today in Ackert 120.

K-State band in need of uniforms

By The Collegian Staff

The K-State marching band, the "Pride of Wildcat Land," needs 225 new uniforms, says Stanley Finck, band director.

"The band has not had new uniforms since 1969, when new uniforms were purchased to replace those burned in the Nichols fire," Finck said. "Life expectancy for a typical band uniform is projected to be, at best, 10 years."

The entire allocated budget for the band comes from the KSU Athletic Department and is $19,500 for the 1988-89 school year.

The band also receives money from the Music Run, an annual music department fund-raiser which secured $17,123 for the band in 1987.

"The money that we raise with the Music Run goes to our traveling expenses. It is a shame that we have to do a fund-raiser. We are here to go to college," said Paul Siegfried, junior in finance and a drum major for the band.

"The band budget is spent on music, instrument replacement, recruiting, and meals and buses when the band travels to away games," Finck said.

"Last year, following the K-State basketball team through the NCAA tournament cost the band $2,047 above the KSU Athletic Department and NCAA allocation," he said. "This does not leave anything for uniform replacement."

By the end of the 1988 marching season, the band will have performed at eight football games, marched in two parades and been featured at a Kansas City Chiefs football game halftime.

In addition, the band will have given a formal concert, played at events in Bramlage Coliseum, and performed at the Central States Marching Festival.

"The band is petitioning the Student Senate for $72,450 to outfit 200 band members with new uniforms," Finck said. "New uniforms would complement the band and would be a visible investment of Senate funds."

Money provided by the Senate would be a long-term investment in recruiting and public relations for the University, Finck said.

"The band provides an unprecedented amount of spirit and entertainment for all of KSU, " he said. "There is a definite need for funding for new uniforms, which I hope the Student Senate will provide."

The band asked for $72,450 in a proposal to the Student Senate Finance Committee.

The committee told the band on Sunday that it would not approve the proposal.

"Now, (the band members) are going to have to go directly in front of Student Senate with our proposal," Siegfried said.

During the past three years, the band has represented all nine of the University's colleges.

"We believe that, because we do represent the entire University, funds should be allocated," he said.

"We are one of the most visible groups on this campus. This year we will be seen by approximately 300,000 people," Siegfried said. "For many people, we are the first impression that they will get of K-State. (The uniforms) may look decent from a distance, but, in actuality, they are torn and very outdated in style."

Debaters win at tournament

The K-State debate team took first-place honors at the Southwest Missouri State University debate tournament this weekend, where more than 60 teams competed.

Todd Graham, assistant debate coach, said the combined efforts of several K-State debate squads contributed to the tournament win, including one squad which had a third-place finish.

"We're off to a very good start this year," Graham said, adding that the victory was a "tremendous accomplishment."

Reviews make reading books unnecessary

Commentary

MARK SCHMELLER
Collegian Columnist

As I walked into Farrell Library's lobby last week, I came across another one of those used book sales, and I couldn't resist. I browsed through the piles of old Harlequin romances and old economics and psychology texts, hoping to find something of value.

It was getting late in the day, and the going rate was a dollar for a grocery sack of books. Suddenly, the lady in charge of the sale yelled, "All the books are now free!" The meek browsers suddenly became mad with hell-bent avarice, grabbing any and all books, quickly glancing at the covers, and then shoving them under their arms and into sacks.

Pandemonium.

I must admit that I got a bit caught up in the madness myself, and started hording paperbacks, one for no other reason than that the words "Complete Unexpurgated Version" were printed on the cover. I left the library in a state of glee over my shopping savvy, feeling like the first man who ever came upon a K Mart.

Yet soon I began to wonder, as I do every time I buy a book, whether I would ever actually read any of my new paperbacks. In fact, I already have too many other books I haven't read. More than likely, the books will end up at another used book sale somewhere.

I suspect that there are a good many other people out there like me, as I don't seriously believe that the people who I saw carting away two or three sacks of books will go home, take out each book and read it cover to cover. I also suspect that, like me, others will nonetheless claim to have read the books and proudly display them on their shelves.

I believe that "I've read that" is the second-most frequently told lie in college, ranking right behind "I was so drunk, I didn't know what I was doing."

The reading line is usually not an outright lie. It is more due to the somewhat nebulous meaning of the word "read." When people claim to have read something, do they mean they went cover to cover, sentence by sentence, taking care to understand the author's intent and to scrutinize his or her arguments? Or do they, as I suspect, often mean that they have read a chapter here and a chapter there, filling in the rest with their imagination.

Such approaches are used every day around the nation. When Johnny Carson plugs a guest's book, telling us how super it is, are we to believe that he really had the time to read it cover to cover? Reading bits and pieces of books is as American as a Reader's Digest Condensed Book.

But what if you wish to read something more cerebral than James Michener or "Drama in Real Life?" There are other ways to "read" a book without actually having to read it. One way is to simply flip to the book review section of a magazine. It's much cheaper, less time-consuming and probably much more interesting. Furthermore, the review does the thinking for you, offering you analysis and insight that will impress your friends, not to mention your professors.

Several years ago, New Republic Editor Michael Kinsley made a similar argument about book reviews and implored all budding authors to not waste time and effort writing a book. Instead, he argued, one should just write a review and cut out the middleman, as nobody probably will read the book anyway.

Consider the ongoing brouhaha over Albert Goldman's book about John Lennon. Many who have come out against the book freely admit that they haven't read it. Instead, they were willing to adopt the opinion of a number of reviewers who think it is libelous. It makes me wonder who wields the real intellectual power in this country. Is it the people who go to the trouble to research and write books, or is it some capricious twit who, unable to make it as an author, writes book reviews, criticizing everything but the reviewer's own mediocre talent.

I have a theory that very few people have actually read many of the books they claim to have read. Who can honestly say that they ever had the time to get through "Moby Dick" or "Crime and Punishment" in the middle of a semester? And when a vacation finally arrives, are we all just raring to pick up a copy of Joyce's "Ulysses" and have a nice read? And with some 38,000 new books every year, the task of absorbing all the new and exciting ideas out there has become futile for anyone who wishes to lead a normal life.

Even when it comes to books assigned for class, do we really have time to get through everything? Has anyone ever made it all the way through Plato's "Republic" without brief lapses when our mind wanders off and we awake to find ourselves paging through Cliff's Notes to find out what just happened?

A friend of mine swears that the people who write Cliff's Notes haven't even read the books they write about. It sounds a bit farfetched, but not entirely crazy. They could have just read the reviews and critiques, condensed them and put the final product between covers to sell for $3.95.

In fact, I have another theory that there are entire bodies of literary criticism that rest upon the assumption that someone, somewhere has actually read the book, and that one reader's review serves as the basis of all later writing. In all honesty, this is a bit paranoid. Nevertheless, it's good excuse for not reading anything myself. If it's good enough for Cliff, it's good enough for me.

I still fondly remember the first book I was able to feign knowledge of without having actually read. It was "1984," by George Orwell. I didn't have to read it, as I had read (or partially read) so many other books and magazines that referred to it. This is perhaps the best way to acquire knowledge of books without reading them. By faithfully watching Jeopardy and reading all the arts and literature cards in Trivial Pursuit, I have acquired a passing knowledge of things literary.

I suspect others have this sort of knowledge, judging from the cursory discussions I hear coming from Espresso Royale and graduate student offices. Indeed, in such circles it seems to be a means of survival, a way for budding intellectuals and academics to back up their own wild theories with "something Freud wrote somewhere" or "this treatise by a little-known Flemish theorist."

More than anything, I get the feeling that books have become somewhat outdated, unable to compete with the deluge of all the other books out there, confusing the question of what we should take time to read. Hence, the best way to rise above the deluge is by being familiar with as many books as possible. It impresses people, and isn't that the reason people started buying, writing and reading books in the first place?

Laws aimed at terrorists may harm British public

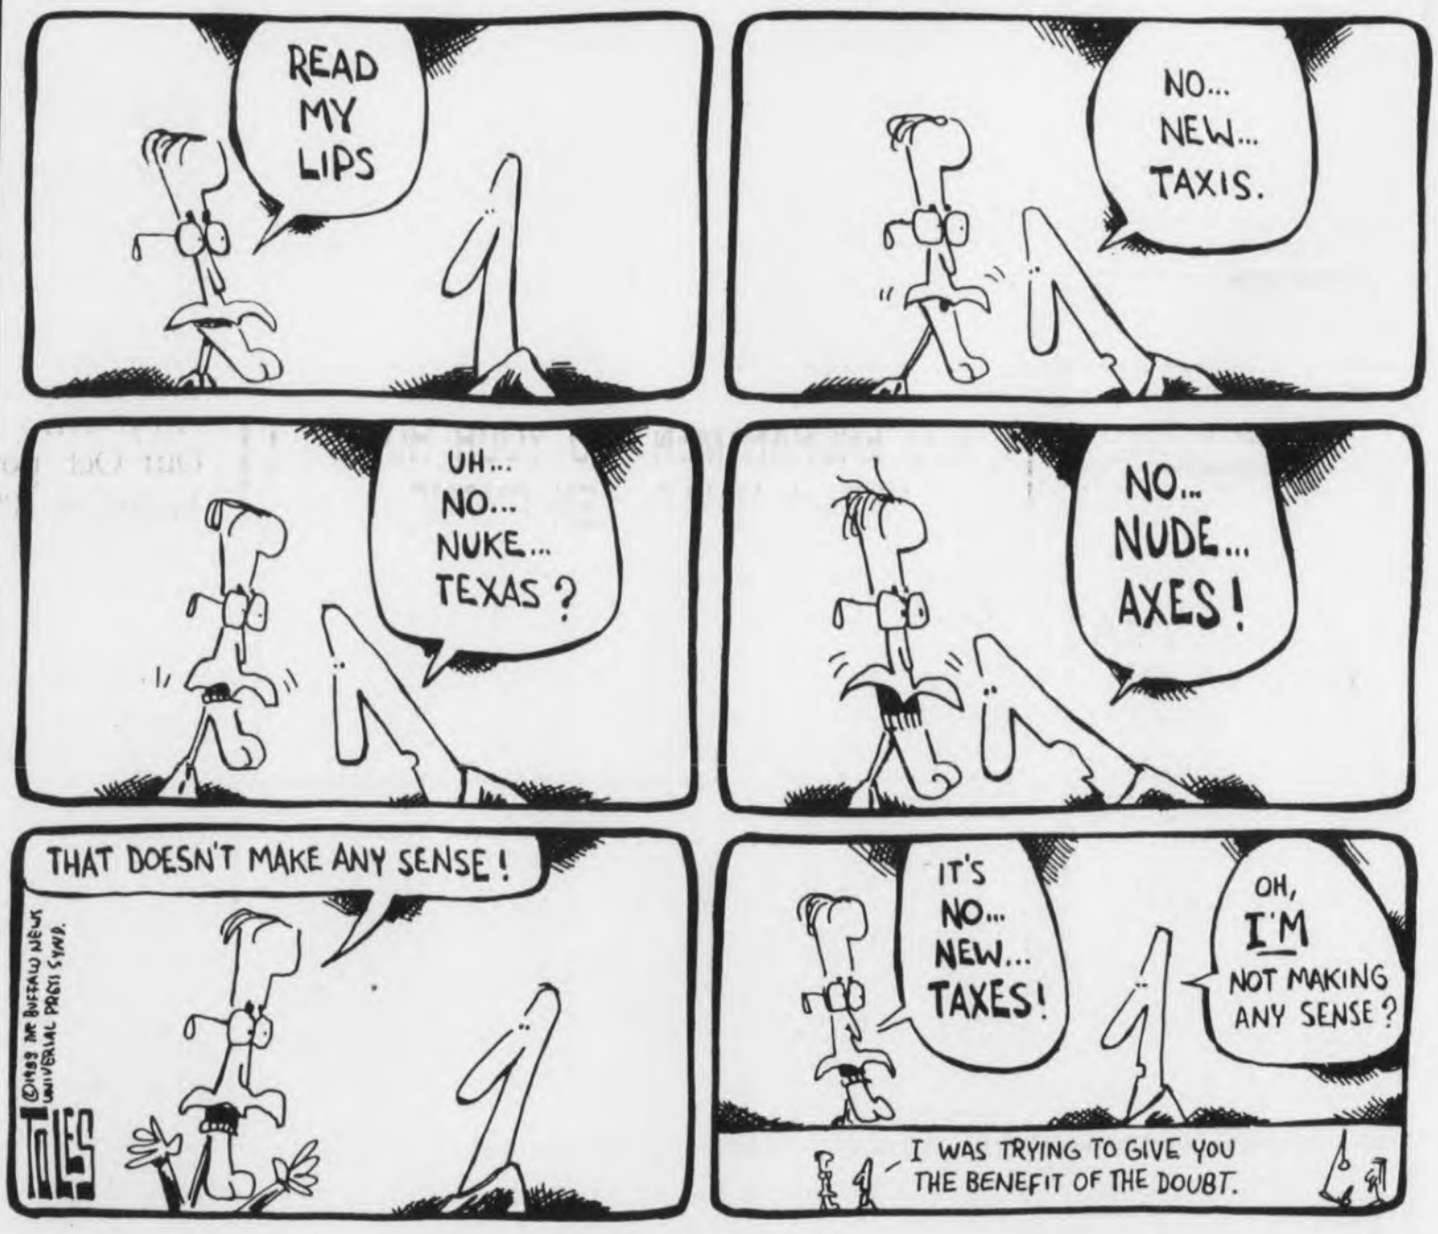
Two recent announcements of proposed laws made by representatives of the government of Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher raise serious questions about the continued protection of Britons' civil rights.

Last week a spokesman for Thatcher's government said it would soon propose a law for consideration by Parliament which would prevent news-gathering organizations from interviewing representatives of extremist groups.

This law would affect not only the Irish Republican Army but Protestant groups as well as the Sinn Fein, the legal, political arm of the IRA. Sinn Fein has elected representatives in Parliament and in Northern Ireland.

The purpose of the law, according to the spokesman, is to deny terrorists the opportunity of achieving their goal of affecting policy by gaining publicity for their causes through publicity of bombings and assassinations.

Yet this proposal comes at a time when the British government appears to be engaging in a shoot-to-kill-on-sight campaign against IRA members.



While the law would not apply during election campaigns, it does limit the type of variety of information available to British citizens as they confront the ongoing conflict between their country and the IRA in Northern Ireland.

The following day, another spokesman announced that a law stripping the right of a defendant to not incriminate himself or herself would be proposed in Parliament.

If passed, when defendants refuse to testify on the grounds that the information given would incriminate themselves, judges could find a presumption of guilt and sentence the defendants.

Like the first law, the second is aimed at terrorists, but eventually this law will affect all defendants in British courts.

In a war which has not prevented the functioning of the British economy or political system, the Thatcher government appears to be doing more harm than good to the citizens it claims to be protecting.

Play appreciated

Editor,

I wish to publicly thank Anne Butler and the considerable number of other individuals and groups who helped bring Ma Rainey's Black Bottom to Manhattan October 7. While the Ebony Theatre Company has allowed us to hear Afro-American voices on the small stage, we need to hear them more often in McCain.

I appreciated being reminded of an important era in American history and culture through Harriet Ottenheimer's background lecture about Ma Rainey and the blues, as well as by August Wilson's play.

Police fail again

Editor,

After being here three years, I have received very little useful help from the K-State Police. I have received several useless parking tickets, half of which I wasn't really guilty. I paid them, rather than fight the one-sided appeal process. Basically, I've received the same bad treatment they give all the students.

In spite of their past record, last week an incident occurred for which I should thank the campus police. I had the misfortune of having battery trouble and I needed a jump start. Thinking (not a good move on my part) that the campus police would be able to help me, I went to their office in Memorial Stadium. Now, as I think back to last week, I realize the campus police only added to my problem — they gave me jumper cables, but would not give me a jump start.

The true thanks goes to one of their student workers — Jenny — who allowed me to get a jump start from her car.

Sorry, campus police. I guess this is just another tally in your complaint column and a thank you to a thoughtful fellow student.

Similar system

Editor,

The information given by Audra Dietz's article "Hall's community phone system unique," in the Oct. 20 Collegian, was not totally correct. Moore Hall is not the only residence hall with a community phone system. Smurthwaite Leadership Hall, one of the 10 (not nine as stated in the article) residence halls at K-State, has no individual phone system in each room. There are two lines that come into the hall and calls are forwarded to one of the three other phones located at the end of the hallway. There are also no receptionists at Smurthwaite, but a resident is on phone duty from 1:30 p.m. to 11:30 p.m. on weekdays and 8:30 a.m. to 11:30 p.m. on weekends. Smurthwaite residents also have the use of one long distance phone.

The article should have been researched more thoroughly before it was written.

Police need to be fit

Editor,

Picture this: a girl is raped while walking across campus. As the rapist flees, a KSU police officer sees him and starts chasing him. But since the officer is overweight and out-of-shape, he has no chance of catching the younger and faster perpetrator as he gets away.

With this thought in mind, I now pose this question. Why does our campus police department not have some sort of fitness requirement that must be met by its officers? Does this mean that it isn't considered a "real" police department, or is this because we only get the rejects who could not get on with legitimate state and local police departments? Maybe less crime would take place on this campus if the thieves thought they were more at risk of getting caught.

Therefore, we need some sort of fitness program that must be met by all of our officers if we are to have a good police department that stops crime.

Eerie Halloween combines good, bad

By Scott Berg
Collegian Reporter

Ghouls, ghosts, goblins and body-robbing spirits are about to descend upon the Earth to haunt the living, as they have for centuries. It will soon be Halloween.

Halloween's macabre nature is a product of its history, a mixture of ancient pagan beliefs and Christian rituals.

The Celts, who lived in ancient Ireland in about 300 B.C., believed that on the eve of the new year, evil spirits roamed the night in search of bodies to inhabit for that year. The Celts would perform special ceremonies to ward off the spirits.

They started the evening by letting the cooking fires burn out so the houses would be too cold for spirits to visit. Then they dressed in costumes as hideous as they could to fool or scare the spirits into leaving them alone. They would make sure the spirits were gone by lighting bonfires on the hilltops.

"The Celts would sometimes make human sacrifices by throwing people who were believed to be possessed by a spirit into the bonfires," said Thomas Murray, assistant professor in English.

These beliefs died out in the 5th century, but Celtic childern continued to dress up in costumes, said Murray.

Other activities, such as games and rituals that involve fortune-telling, were played by young people. These were supposed to determine their marital prospects for the next year.

The Christian festivities began in the 8th century when Pope Gregory III declared that Nov. 1 would be a day to pay tribute to the saints. Festivities soon began to occur on All Hallows Eve, the night before All Saints Day.

The festivities included the poor going from door to door to beg for bits of food. The people in the houses would act in the good manner of the saints and give food to the beggars.

The custom of giving candy to children came from this activity, Murray said.

When the Irish immigrants came to the United States in the 19th century, they brought the candy-giving tradition with them.

A hatchet murderer is loose in Putnam Hall. A terror trail winds through Sunset Zoo. And everything is out of the ordinary at Haymaker Hall. It is Halloween time again, and along with Halloween comes haunted houses.

Putnam Hall residents' house will be open from 8 p.m. to midnight, Friday and Saturday. Residents plan to frighten their patrons through disorientation, surprise and mazes, said Jill Taylor, freshman undecided and publicity co-chairwoman for Putnam.

"We'll have strobe lights set up and that creates a really interesting effect. We're also going to set up mazes to disorientate people," Taylor said.

Residents of Haymaker will also have a haunted house this weekend.

Dave Clark, sophomore in computer science and coordinator of the Haymaker spook house, described what will transpire Thursday through Saturday at 8 p.m.

"We'll be going for everything out of the ordinary this year," Clark said. "We will also have two floors this year, instead of one. So we've got more room to really expand on some things. We'll have a lot of unexpected things happen."

New haunting grounds will join the circuit this year. Sunset Zoo will be the site for the Terror Trail. At 6:30 p.m. Sunday, ghoul guides will begin tours.

Visitors can choose from two trails — one for the experienced and one for the novice — said Anne Woodmansee, project coordinator.

"The peek-a-boo trail will be for ages 7 and under," she said. "The idea here is to startle, but not frighten. The Terror Trail, however, will consist of about 16 to 20 acts that run the gamut of everything horrifying from Dracula to Freddy of Elm Street."

A local radio station will sponsor the event and Manhattan Civic Theater will be doing face painting before 6:30 p.m., Woodmansee said.

Several safety elements must be considered before haunted houses are opened to the public. Some materials and plastics can give off toxic fumes if there is a fire.

"We were using plastic and the fire marshal told us we couldn't use that, so we are having to do ours over," Taylor said.

"The fire marshal suggested using plywood and materials that are soaked in a flame-retardant solution," she said.

Insurance also must be considered. Haymaker is doing its haunted house for the March of Dimes organization, so the house is insured by that organization.

"We are careful not to use open flames or anything like that, but we do have to think about insurance, so the March of Dimes covers that for us," Clark said.

Sunset Zoo is protected by public insurance, Woodmansee said.

Putman has not taken out special insurance, but it has followed the fire marshal's recommendations.

"For areas of public assembly, like the zoo, there is an insurance coverage that is specifically for public places. If you ask the public in, you do have to be aware of liabilities," Woodmansee said.

Costs and profits of these events are also considerations. Residents of Putnam thought it would only cost about $400 to build their haunted house, but now they have had to redo most of it.

"We are finding that it is going to cost us about $800 now. We hope to clear about $400," Taylor said.

The Putnam haunted house will cost 50 cents a person. Once the admission is paid, horror seekers can go through the house as many times as they want.

Cemetery houses memorials, history

First grave dug in 1860s

By Susan E. Faler
Collegian Reporter

An inspiration to the living.

Trick-or-treaters on Sunset Avenue this Halloween will hardly think of Sunset Cemetery as such, but that was the aim of the cemetery's founders.

In 1908, the Manhattan Mercury offered a small cash prize for the best name for the cemetery. Mrs. George A. Dean suggested the name Sunset Hill. It was judged the best of the suggestions submitted, according to an article in a Riley County Historical Society publication by C.M. Correll about the cemetery.

A request was made to the City Commission that Sunset Hill be adopted as the official name, but no action was taken. Consequently, the prize money was never paid.

Because the name seemed to appeal to the public, and it was used commonly, it gradually took the form "Sunset Cemetery." Finally on Dec. 31, 1935, this name was officially designated.

Although the first burial cannot be determined, it is believed that Juliet Lovejoy Whitehorn was the first person buried in the cemetery. Whitehorn, 20, died in November 1860 of typhoid fever.

Her family later moved from Manhattan, leaving arrangements with a local stone cutter to set the stone, but the inscription was never made.

The reason for his failure is blamed on the stone cutter's habitual use of intoxicants — he was never sober enough to complete the work, according to Correll's article.

All graves are dug 5 to 6 feet deep and the cost for a single grave space is $250, but all the plots in Sunset Cemetery have already been sold, said Frank Johnson, cemetery sexton.

"There are a total of 25,000 grave spaces in Sunset and 15,000 to 20,000 are already occupied," he said.

Some people seem to think tombstones and monuments are for vandalism purposes, he said, and although the intent of the vandalism is usually fun and games, the cemetery has sustained some serious damage from it.

"One time several boys were driving around and entered the south gate of the cemetery, knocking over 33 stones at a northwest angle," Johnson said.

In 1931, a music tower was built as part of a federal employment program. The purpose of the tower was to provide the cemetery with memorial music.

Every evening at sunset, a 15- to 20-minute memorial program was played in a setting which "defies description," according to Correll's article.

The tower is approximately 50 feet in height and 15 feet in diameter. About 175 records were kept in the tower to provide the music.

The sound was distributed by 10 large loudspeakers concealed behind the aluminum grills at the top of the tower.

The tower was vandalized twice. The first time, when it was set on fire, it was salvaged. To prevent futher vandalism, a steel door was placed in the entrance, Johnson said.

During the early 1970s, however, the steel door was torn from its hinges by vandals, and the tower was set on fire. The tower was unable to be saved.

All that remains of the tower is the white structure.

"The cemetery closes at sundown and anyone caught in the cemetery after hours is subject to trespassing," Johnson said.

Those arrested could face civil and criminal fines for trespassing, said Sgt. Larry Freeby, of the Riley County Police Department.

Cemetery officials hope to limit the materials for monuments to the most durable types, such as marble, granite and bronze to further prevent vandalism and destruction.

Some memorials include a tablet, cross, monumental seat, biblical statue, sundial, bird bath, urn or vase. Memorials often have quotes, special messages and poems.

The Bradley and Warrene Peterson tombstone has the "Lovers' Prayer" imprinted on it. The poem reads:

"Heavenly Father up above, please protect the one I love. Keep her safe, and keep her sound no matter where she may be found. Help her to know, and help her to see that I love her and let her love me. Help me to be and help me to do, all the things she'd want me to. Keep us now and keep us forever, always in love and always together."

The poem was written to his wife by Bradley E. Peterson. Both are now buried in the cemetery.

Another impressive structure in the cemetery is the Wareham mausoleum.

The circular plot, which is 100 feet in diameter, was purchased by H.P. Wareham for $1,000. A mausoleum of marble was built on the plot, and a contract was signed prohibiting the the use of the mausoleum by anyone except Wareham family members.

Before Wareham died, he left a fund to be used for the care and maintenance of the ground and building.

West Europeans offer Soviets credit

By The Associated Press

FRANKFURT, West Germany — West European bankers are offering the Soviets huge amounts of credit to use in modernizing their consumer economy, but Japan's relations with Moscow are cool and its bankers are holding back.

State Department sources in Washington emphasize that the deals do not involve direct loans, but lines of credit, which become loans only as the available credit is used.

They said the credit lines appear designed to finance specific trade arrangements and cannot be classed as "untied loans" — money to be spent however the borrower chooses.

The United States does not oppose lending at market rates for non-strategic purposes but is against government subsidies of loans, the sources said on condition of anonymity.

Peter Pietsch, a finance and trade expert with West Germany's Commerzbank, told The Associated Press: "Credit not only from West Germany but from all of Western Europe will be increasing and expanding in coming years."

"This has to do with the Soviet Union's goal of opening up politically and economically, which also includes an increase in trade activities," said Pietsch.

Film gives look at 'new Bronson image'

By Judd Annis
Collegian Reviewer

In modern American filmmaking, several macho men stand out.

Among the Clints, Arnolds, and Sylvesters, Charles Bronson has established himself as a symbol of good action and suspense.

Bronson's latest movie, "Messenger of Death," gives his fans a look at a new Bronson image while providing the actor a chance to develop a new, interesting character.

The movie is based on the novel "The Avenging Angel" by Rex Burns. Bronson plays the part of a Denver newspaper reporter assigned to cover a massacre involving a Mormon commune.

As the investigation progresses, Bronson butts heads with bigwigs in Denver politics and in the religious community.

To find the truth behind the killings, he must gingerly tap every source, some of whom see reporting as an invasion of privacy and refuse to cooperate.

Bronson's work takes him on a journey into the beliefs and practices of devout religious living, polygamy and personal vengeance as opposed to the will of God.

Although the film attempts to mold these subjects into a central theme, the newspaper perspective and its portrayal are much more intriguing.

To solve the mystery and get his story, Bronson must remain an objective journalist with a nod toward Sherlock Holmes.

Ethical issues facing today's investigative reporter are addressed, although they don't present much of a problem for Bronson, who always gets his man.

In this slight role reversal, Bronson is a real pussycat.

He doesn't terminate anyone and only shoots a firearm once (and not even at anyone). He's like Columbo, only more polished and better dressed.

This role allows Bronson some breathing room and a vehicle with which to expand his stereotype as a trigger-happy vigilante.

Director J. Lee Thompson decided to play it safe, however, all but ignoring the opportunity to create a new super-reporter on which to base future films.

Although there aren't any gaping holes in the plot, the resolution is predictable and the ending disappointing.

"Messenger of Death" is shallow mystery-making, but is still worth viewing on discount night.

Italian police find U.S. captives' photos

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Islamic Jihad, a pro-Iranian group holding two U.S. hostages, said Monday it was not linked to the Lebanese woman arrested in Italy with photographs of captive Americans.

The group claimed the woman, Aline Ibrahim Rizkallah, 36, had ties to Israel's secret service.

Islamic Jihad challenged Italian authorities to publish a photograph of American hostage Terry Anderson that was found in the woman's luggage at Milan airport last Thursday.

"What has been said about about the presence of a photograph of captive Anderson is sheer fabrication and is absolutely devoid of truth," Islamic Jihad said in a typewritten Arabic-language statement delivered to a Western news agency in Beirut.

The 15-line communique was delivered with an photograph of Anderson to authenticate it.

The kidnappers apparently did not know that authorities in Milan had already released a copy of the photograph of Anderson that was discovered in the woman's luggage.

"We hold Italian authorities fully responsible for collaborating in a malicious conspiracy aimed at besmirching our image in the eyes of public opinion. This will not go unpunished," the Islamic Jihad statement said.

Soccer played Chartrand-style

K-State team hosts 10th annual tourney

By The Collegian Staff

The University of Kansas and the K-State men's soccer teams started battling Saturday night and didn't finish the intrastate war until Sunday afternoon when KU took first place in the 10th Annual Ed Chartrand Memorial Soccer Tournament.

The tournament, organized by the K-State Men's Soccer Club, is played in memory of Ed Chartrand, a former K-State soccer player from Leawood.

The K-State soccer team founded the tournament after Chartrand's death in May 1979.

Teams in this year's tournament were Oklahoma State University, Iowa State University, Central Missouri State University, the University of Nebraska at Omaha, the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, the University of Missouri, KU and K-State.

"This year's tournament has been better than ever," said Dennis Cook, tournament manager. "This year, we have six teams from the Big Eight. This is the first year that we have had MU in the tournament. It made a nice addition."

The women's teams from K-State and the Kansas also played an exhibition game Saturday. K-State won, 1-0.

Things did not go as well, however, for the K-State men.

The first men's K-State-KU game was played in front of about 500 fans Saturday night at Olathe North High School District Stadium. All other games were at the Kenneth Road Soccer Complex in Kansas City, Mo.

K-State, with a record of 4-6-3, tied KU — a team with a record of 17-2-2 — sending both teams into Sunday's semifinals.

"There has been a big change in how much high schools are embracing soccer in a formal way," said David Chartrand, member of the Chartrand family. "Five years ago, we (the tournament) could not have played a game there (Olathe North Stadium) to that big of a crowd."

"I am not used to that big of a crowd," said Rob Healy, senior in electrical engineering and K-State coach. "The average turnout for one of (K-State's) games is about 20."

The team is composed mostly of freshmen.

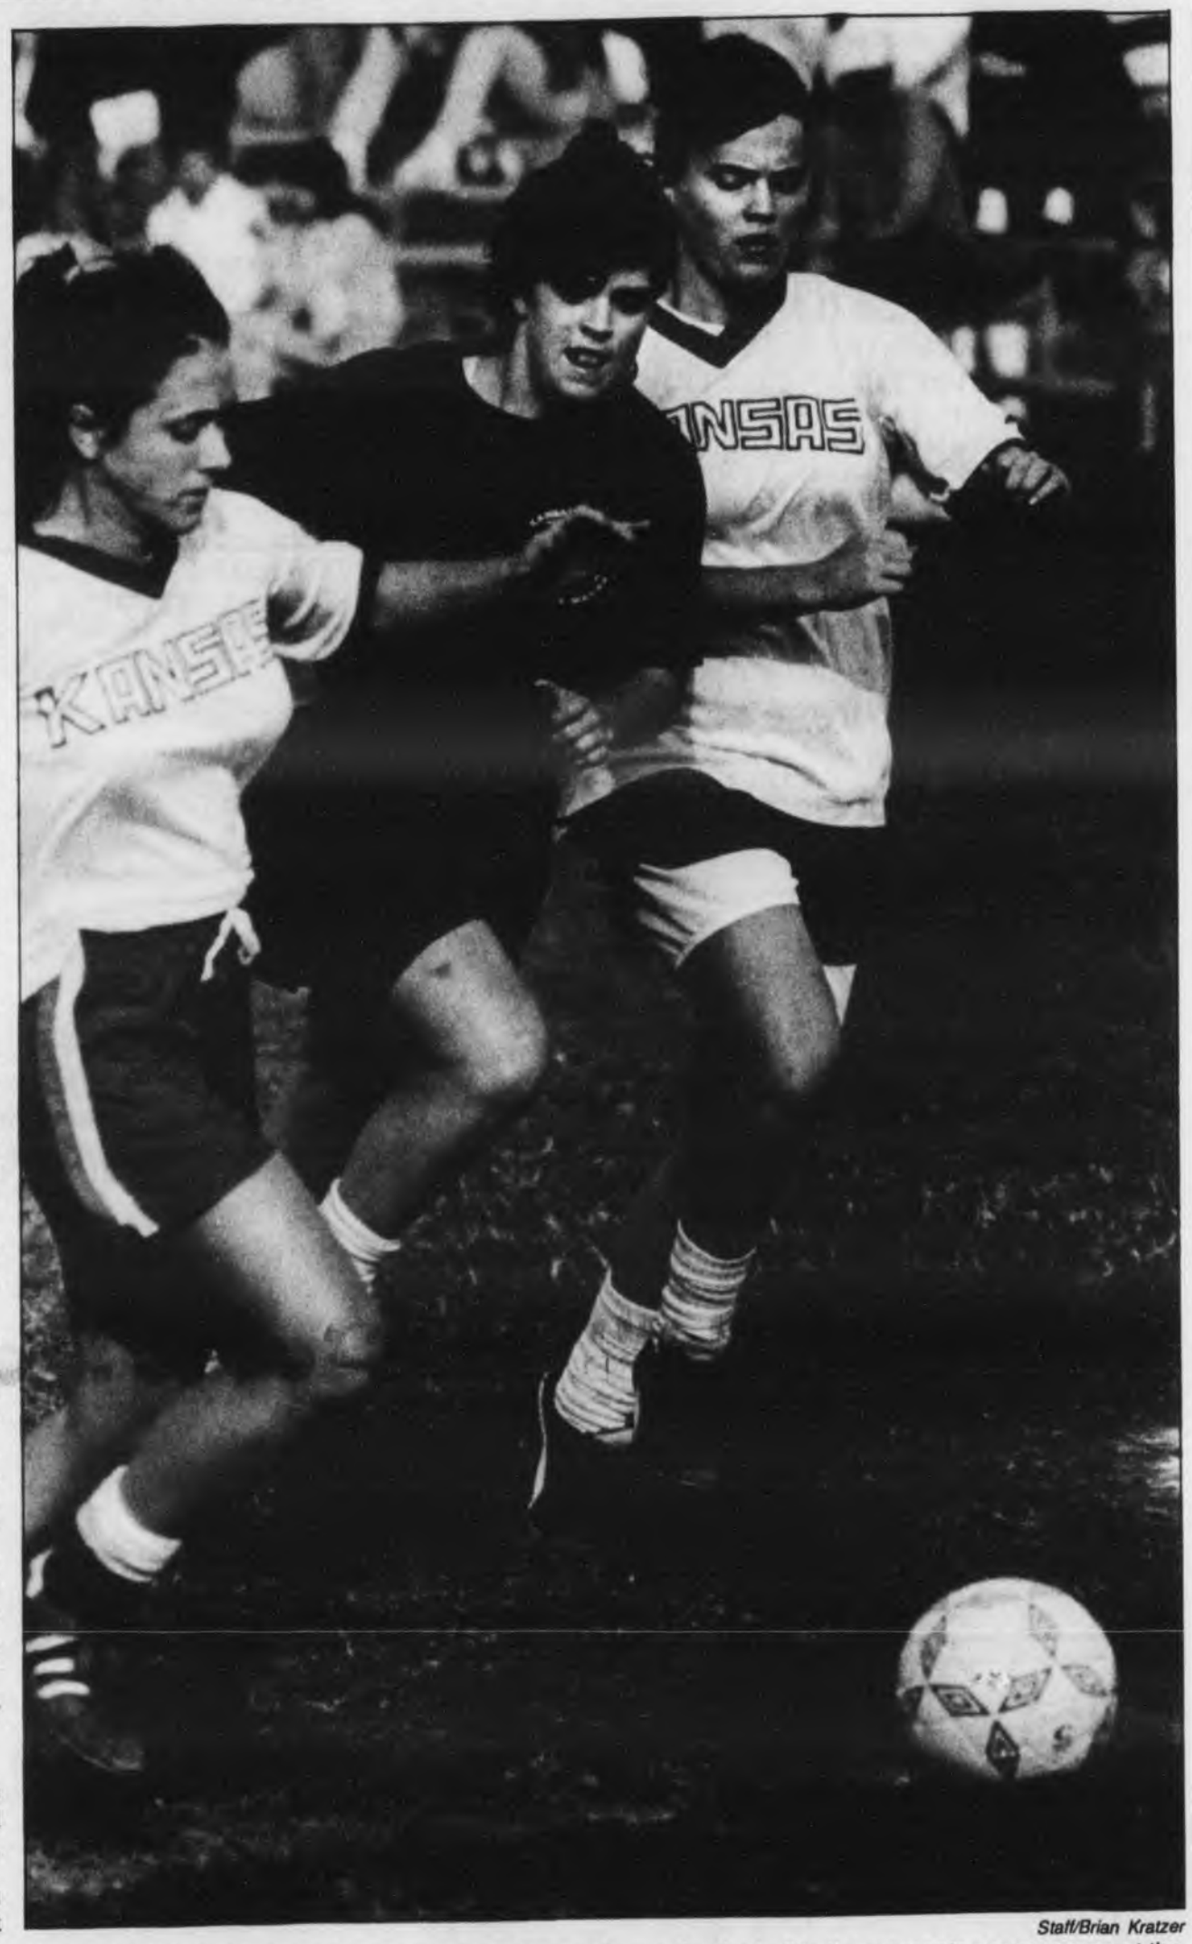
Healy, the oldest member of the team, was injured early this year and has taken over the coaching duties.

"I really want to play. When you like a sport a lot, it is hard to just watch," Healy said.

The Ed Chartrand Memorial Scholarship was also presented Saturday night by the Chartrand family.

This year's recipient of the $500 scholarship was Troy Bechtel, freshman in engineering.

KU defeated Nebraska in the semifinals, 2-0, while K-State slipped past Iowa State, 2-1, creating a rematch in the championship game.



It was a battle again.

K-State took a quick lead in the first half, but KU quickly came back to tie the score at 1-1. In the second half, KU took the lead and held on for a 3-2 victory.

"It has been a long time since we have won the tournament," said Glen Shirtliff, KU coach.

KU had only won the tournament once, in 1982.

"K-State played a very good game. Anyone could have won that game," Shirtliff said. "This is a first-rate tournament. The organization and commitment of the Chartrand family makes it a great soccer tournament in the Midwest."

Staff/Brian Kratzer

K-State's Nikki Klein competes against two Kansas players for the ball in the women's soccer game at the 10th Annual Ed Chartrand Memorial Tournament in Kansas City, Mo. K-State won the game, 1-0.

Johnson receives 2-year suspension for use of steroids

By The Associated Press

OTTAWA, Ontario — Ben Johnson, who tested positive for drugs after winning the Olympic 100-meter dash, was officially suspended for two years by the Canadian Track and Field Association Monday, while his coach was suspended indefinitely.

In addition to the suspensions of Johnson and Coach Charlie Francis, the association announced two limited inquiries into events surrounding the sprinter's positive test for an anabolic steroid at the Seoul Games.

But the association left questions about its handling of rumors about steroid use by Johnson and other Canadian runners for the commission of inquiry headed by Justice Charles Dubin. That inquiry will begin shortly.

Johnson, 26, was suspended from competing for Canada for two years, retroactive to Sept. 24, the day he tested positive for use of a banned performance-enhancing steroid and was stripped of his 100-meter gold medal.

The two-year suspension was levied by the International Amateur Athletic Federation, the world governing body for track and field, and ratified by the Canadian body, Dupre said. There is no appeal of the suspension.

However, Johnson can appeal his loss of the gold medal to the International Olympic Committee's court of arbitration for sport, Dupre said.

Francis, Johnson's personal coach and the track and field association's sprint coach, was suspended with pay until the group's personnel committee can review his status, Dupre said. Francis earns more than $40,000 a year from the organization and gets benefits from track and field sponsors.

Dupre said the association would investigate statements by several Canadian runners and coaches about steroid use, including comments by Angella Issajenko, Angela Bailey, Yolanda Jones and Gary Lubin.

Dupre and Kyle McDuffie, chairman of the association's athletes council, will conduct the inquiry.

Clemens selected as baseball's best

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Roger Clemens of the Boston Red Sox is the best player in baseball, edging World Series hero Orel Hershiser of the Los Angeles Dodgers, according to statistical rankings for the past two years.

The rankings, compiled by the Elias Sports Bureau and released Monday, gave Clemens a 96.203 score for the 1987-88 seasons, with Hershiser at 96.135. Frank Viola of the Minnesota Twins was third at 96.097 and Dwight Gooden of the New York Mets fourth at 95.169, giving pitchers a sweep of the first four places.

Outfielder Dwight Evans of Boston was the top non-pitcher, ranking fifth with a score of 94.795.

The best possible score of 100 has been reached only once, by first baseman Don Mattingly of the New York Yankees last year.

The rankings, now in their eighth season, are used to determine what draft choices are used as compensation for free agents. They also are used to compare players. They combine statistics such as batting average, plate appearances, home runs and runs batted in for hitters, and starts, innings, earned-run average, saves and strikeouts for pitchers. The statistics used vary from position to position.

Philadelphia's Mike Schmidt was the top-ranked third baseman in the National League and is the only player to lead his position in all eight seasons. Gary Carter of the Mets, who led at NL catcher for seven years, dropped to sixth.

Ozzie Smith of the St. Louis Cardinals led NL shortstops for the fifth straight season and Ryne Sandberg of the Chicago Cubs led NL second basemen for the fifth straight year. Todd Worrell of the Cardinals was the top NL reliever for the second straight season.

Atlanta's Dale Murphy, who led NL outfielders from 1983-87, dropped to ninth. Pedro Guererro of St. Louis led NL outfielders, followed by Darryl Strawberry of the Mets and Kal Daniels of Cincinnati.

At first base, Will Clark of San Francisco replaced Keith Hernandez of the Mets, who had led for four straight years.

Mattingly, the top AL first baseman for three years, dropped to second, behind the Royals' George Brett. Mattingly's score dropped to 87.

Basketball Briefly

Sooners picked to finish 1st

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Oklahoma, which finished runner-up to Kansas in last year's NCAA basketball title game, finished first this year in the 10th annual Big Eight media poll.

The Sooners received 37 first-place votes and 25 second-place tallies, edging Missouri which had 24 and 32, respectively.

The pollsters tabbed K-State third and Oklahoma State fourth. Kansas was picked to do no better than fifth, followed by Iowa State, Nebraska and Colorado. Oklahoma center Stacey King was predicted as player of the year.

In Dick Vitale's Basketball magazine, the Wildcats were picked to finish third in the conference and 27th nationally.

Place ticket orders soon

Basketball ticket sales at K-State are running well ahead of last year's total, and K-State ticket manager Carol Adolph is encouraging fans to place their orders soon.

Last year, including student ticket sales, K-State sold approximately 8,500 season tickets. This season, K-State has sold more than 9,000 tickets with over a month remaining until the first game.

Kruger to be on TV special

KAKE-TV of Wichita will air a special program at 6:30 p.m. Wednesday, which will feature, among others, K-State basketball coach Lon Kruger.

The program is a replay of a dinner held earlier this month in Wichita. It was a fund-raiser for the Wichita Eye Foundation, and featured speeches by Kruger, Wichita State coach Eddie Fogler and Kansas coach Roy Williams.

KAKE-TV is channel 16 on Manhattan cable.

Wyoming cracks Top 10 in AP poll

UCLA, Notre Dame still hold top 2 spots

By The Associated Press

CHEYENNE, Wyo. — Wyoming's meteoric rise in The Associated Press college football poll is a tribute to the turnaround that has the Cowboys riding the nation's longest regular-season winning streak.

A .500 team two years ago, Wyoming cracked the Top Ten on Monday for the first time in 21 years, following Saturday's 61-18 rout of Utah. UCLA, Notre Dame and Southern California held onto the top three spots.

"We're certainly happy about it," Wyoming Coach Paul Roach said. "It's good for our state, our program, the university. And it's good for the WAC (Western Athletic Conference) to receive some recognition.

"However, for our players and our coaches, it's a peripheral thing. We still focus in on our No. 1 goal, and that's to defend our (WAC) championship."

Wyoming is 8-0 overall, 5-0 in conference play and has won its last 17 regular-season games.

The No. 10 ranking marked Wyoming's fifth consecutive week in the poll and was the highest since the Cowboys were No. 6 in the final 1967 listings with a 10-0 record.

"We don't use it as incentive," Roach said of the rankings. "I'm sure that pleases our players to receive that recognition. But we're not defending a ranking. We're defending a championship, and therein lies the difference."

Roach couldn't single out anything that has transformed the Cowboys from a 6-6 team in 1986 to an undefeated powerhouse, other than to point to his players' and coaches' dedication and ambition.

"We just happen to have enough of the right things and the right chemistry, at least up to this point," he said. "All those things (rankings, winning streaks) at some point in time come to an end. Cinderella takes her wand and goes home."

UCLA, which became No. 1 last week after Miami lost to Notre Dame, defeated Arizona 24-3 Saturday and received 35 of 60 first-place votes and 1,171 of a possible 1,200 points from a nationwide panel of sports writers and sportscasters.

Notre Dame, a 41-13 winner over Air Force, was second for the second week in a row, with 19 first-place votes and 1,144 points. UCLA and Notre Dame are 7-0-0.

Southern Cal, 6-0-0, was idle over the weekend. The Trojans received five first-place votes and 1,086 points. UCLA plays Southern Cal Nov. 19 and Southern Cal meets Notre Dame Nov. 26.

Miami remained fourth with 1,024 points, following a 57-3 rout of Cincinnati, and Nebraska held onto fifth place with 893 points by trouncing K-State 48-3.

Florida State crushed Division I-AA Louisiana Tech 66-3 and moved up from seventh place to sixth with 889 points.

The other first-place vote went to 7-0-0 West Virginia, which dropped from sixth place to seventh despite a 59-19 rout of Boston College. The Mountaineers received 885 points.

Oklahoma edged Colorado 17-14 and remained No. 8 with 762 points. Clemson lost to North Carolina State 10-3 and fell from ninth to 15th, while Auburn's 33-0 victory over Mississippi State enabled the Tigers to jump from ninth to eighth with 706 points.

Wyoming rounded out the Top Ten with 653 points.

The Second Ten consisted of Arkansas, Oklahoma State, Louisiana State, Michigan, Clemson, Syracuse, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama and Oregon.

Last week it was Georgia, Wyoming, Arkansas, Indiana, Oklahoma State, LSU, Washington, South Carolina, Syracuse and Michigan.

Dukakis: Bush telling 'lies'

By The Associated Press

Michael Dukakis, an underdog running short of time, accused George Bush on Monday of resorting to "outright lies" to avoid important campaign issues. Bush replied that Democrats are desperate and said Dukakis is soft on crime and defense "and that's the inescapable truth."

There was no letup in a White House campaign never noted for civility.

"Hitler would have loved these people," Democratic Rep. Richard Gephardt said of the Republicans as he campaigned for Dukakis.

With 15 days until Election Day, Bush and running mate Dan Quayle were doing their best to protect a lead in the national public opinion polls. Dukakis purchased time for the second in a series of five-minute network television commercials as he and ticketmate Lloyd Bentsen looked for a way to catch fire.

Dukakis stuck to his late-campaign Populist theme and said Bush would personally receive a $22,000-a-year tax break from his proposal to cut the capital gains tax.

"George Bush wants to give people like George Bush a tax break that's more than the average California worker makes in a year," Dukakis said in Los Angeles. "Look in the mirror and ask yourself: Is George Bush on your side?"

The vice president defended his tax proposal as good for creating new jobs. He said Dukakis is likely to raise taxes if he gets the chance and the nation could face an "economic disaster if the liberals take over the White House."

Campaigning through New England, Bush made an unusual departure from his prepared speech to reject Dukakis' charges of campaign distortions and deceptions.

He said he could document every one of the allegations made in television advertisements criticizing a Massachusetts prison furlough program and his rival's record on defense.

Hurt 'looking to the future' in representative campaign

By Amy Rosebrough
Collegian Reporter

Editor's note: this is part eight of a series on the candidates for the Kansas Legislature.

If Katha Hurt were to sum up her campaign philosophy in one sentence, it would be: "I'm trying to look to the future."

Hurt is running for State Rep. in the 66th District against Ivan Sand for the second time. In the last election, Hurt lost by 126 votes. She said she believes the last election gave her the experience she needs to win this one.

"I think the name recognition has carried over (to this campaign)," she said. "I have learned presence of mind — how to speak better. I think I am better skilled in dealing with people, and I know what to worry about and what not to worry about."

Hurt has been involved in politics for 11 years. Her first experience in politics was in 1978 when she campaigned for Robert Wooten, who was running for the U.S. House of Representatives. Wooten lost the election, but Hurt said she was inspired to continue her involvement in politics because she "found it exciting."

The "people" issues are of major importance to Hurt. She said she wants to bring creativity, energy, a fresh approach and two-way communication to this election campaign. She said this is the area where Sand may lose some votes.

Although she is for the Kansas highway proposal, Hurt said there are three factors that must be considered. The plan needs developing in the maintenance of current roads, ensuring their user-safety and a coherent division of funding, she said.

"I would encourage an unbiased study team of experts to propose where the new roads should run," she said.

Hurt is for the building of another prison in Kansas, but said she does not think building prisons will solve overcrowding problems.

"We need to strengthen community correction facilities and deal with the criminals in other ways," she said.

The hard-core criminals need to be put in prisons, but there are alternatives for criminals who have committed lesser offenses, she said. In-house arrest, community service and community correction facilities are a few alternatives that she says would work.

Kansas tax codes must be changed to match Federal taxes, Hurt said. The state has $300 million in reserve, but figures state that $140 million is all that is needed in reserve for this state, she said.

This money should be returned to the community or the local government to use for community services.

"(This money could be used) for funding for education, social programs, for single parents with children, to break the welfare cycle and for community correction," she said.

Vaccine production delayed

By The Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — Production of the nation's supply of flu vaccine has been delayed up to two months and supplies will be short during the best time to protect patients, pharmaceutical firms and public health officials said Monday.

The companies blame that on late notification from the federal Centers for Disease Control on what type of vaccine would be needed this year. The CDC says the problem stems from the fact that some of the viruses causing this year's flu take unusually long to cultivate for vaccines.

The largest producer of the vaccines, Wyeth Laboratories Inc., of St. Davids in suburban Philadelphia, usually has shipped the bulk of its 9 million doses by September.

This year, Wyeth will be sending vaccine to physicians through early to mid-November, said company spokeswoman Audrey Ashby. Then it will take additional time to get people in for their shots.

October and November are considered the best times for immunization.

The highest risk group for the flu, and traditionally last on the list of those immunized, are older people in living in close quarters in big-city nursing homes, said Paul Stehr-Green, an immunologist with the Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta.

Doctors prefer to immunize them last because their systems do not hold the antibody as long as younger people's, he said.

"If they don't get it in time, there's a risk of an influenza epidemic among older people," he said.

lack of space causes a faculty member to work away from the department or at home, it reduces the availability of the faculty to the campus community."

Space is a factor in the problem of faculty morale in the department, Stroh said.

"If any other department on campus had six faculty members in one office, it would be screaming to the high heavens," he said.

Physical surroundings play an important role in recruiting and retaining new faculty and students, Kaiser said.

"What kind of message do we give to the public if the space used for one of the most important life-learning processes isn't in decent shape?" he said.

There are a lot of demands for a limited amount of resources, Kaiser said. The priorities are to make the space as livable as possible, usable for more hours each day, and to provide research and instructional space for faculty and staff.

"I think we have first-rate faculty and students in the art department, but the caliber of space is not worthy of a major university," he said. "To provide adequate and quality space for an art department of a university of (K-State's) size will take a major change."

The College of Arts and Sciences is working to find additional space for faculty and classrooms and to upgrade the more serious problems of space inadequacies and safety in the Art Building and West Stadium, Kaiser said.

The Kansas Board of Regents established guidelines to calculate an estimate of space needs in square feet. The space needs were calculated for each department and administrative unit of the University, including lecture classes, office space, research labs and teaching labs, Cooper said.

Office space is calculated by the number of full-time equivalent employees and research space is estimated on the number of faculty and graduate students doing research, she said. The space needed for teaching labs is calculated by the number of undergraduate and graduate weekly student contact hours — the number of hours students spend in a lab or classroom.

General classroom space is estimated by calculating the number of non-lab weekly student contact hours, Cooper said. Space in buildings that are used for specialized activities — such as the Union, Brandeberry Indoor Complex and Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, is calculated separately.

"These calculated need estimates do not include the future needs of the University — they are based on current programs offered," she said. "They do not reflect the condition or quality of space in the University buildings or incorporate capital improvements planned or in progress."

The designated non-classroom space need for the Department of Art is 56,794 square feet, said Larry Garvin, director of facilities planning. The current assignable space is 41,747 square feet, a 15,047 square feet, or 26.5 percent, difference.

One solution to the department's problem is the projected renovation of Willard Hall, Kaiser said.

"A hopeful estimate of the Willard renovation is in the range of five to 10 years," Cooper said.

The renovation of Willard is dependent upon the completion of Chemistry/Biochemistry II and the state's funding schedule for buildings, she said.

awareness campaigns of their own.

"Our focus will be on groups that impact the lives of children," Hughes said.

These groups will include local Boy Scout and Girl Scout troops, churches, junior high schools and high schools.

She said: "We will work with more than just the schools, but we will work in the community."

The center also plans to work on the collegiate level by speaking to various clubs and living groups and training staff members to deal with students who may have substance abuse problems, she said.

Life-skills training will also be available.

"Children who have better life skills tend to have fewer problems with drugs and alcohol," Hughes said.

Life-skills training teaches youth to make responsible decisions about drugs and alcohol.

All 13 counties will have access to the regional resource center. These services will provide films and literature to promote drug awareness in other communities.

Pawnee Mental Health Services will provide assistance directly to Riley, Pottawatomie, Clay, Marshall, Geary and Washington counties.

Counties receiving assistance through cooperation with other centers include: Doniphan, Brown, Nemaha and Jackson counties, through the Kanza Mental Health and Guidance Center, Inc. in Hiawatha; Wabaunsee County, through the Mental Health Center of East Central Kansas in Emporia; and Atchison and Jefferson counties through the NE Kansas Mental Health and Guidance Center in Atchison.

keeping the cost of the renovation down.

Housing costs are lower at K-State than at other universities in the regents system. Krause said he estimated the cost of room and board will increase about $60 per semester, depending on when the fee is instigated, because of the renovations.

Thomas Frith, director of housing, and Lawrence Garvin, director of Physical Facilities, said they expect a student committee to be formed for the renovation plan.

Apartment tax abatement repealed by commission

By Angela J. Smith
Collegian Reporter

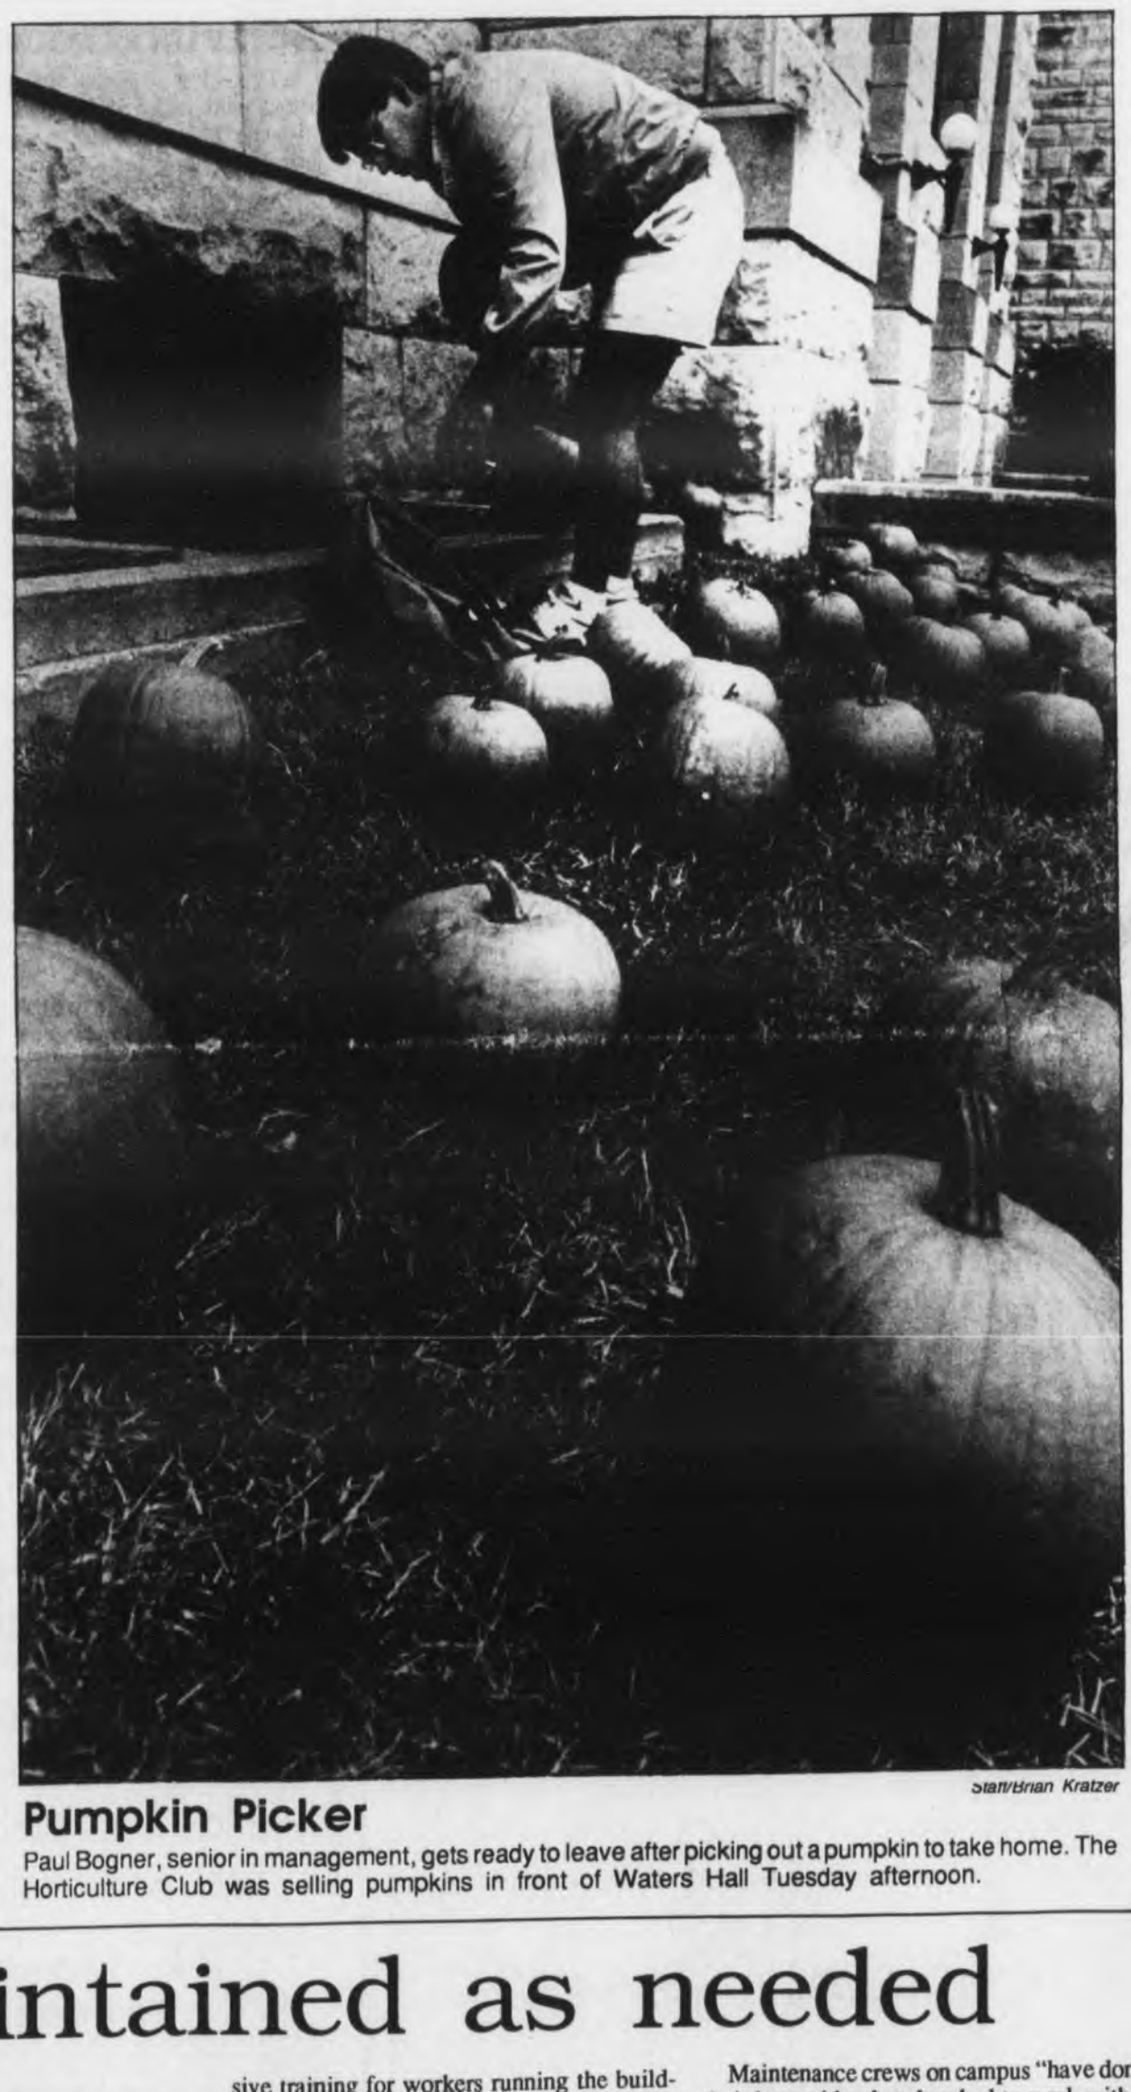
In a special meeting Tuesday, the Manhattan City Commission reconsidered action taken at its Oct. 18 meeting concerning the construction of a proposed apartment complex.

The action involved a $1 million tax abatement to Curtain-Bowman Developers for construction of an apartment complex at the intersection of Westport Road and Claflin Drive. The Commission passed three motions concerning the complex.

The first motion was to rescind the tax abatement plan, with the agreement that the Riley County Commission and the Manhattan Unified School Board of Education would be notifed.

"I think we did not do thorough homework with this issue and would like to rescind our action," said Commissioner Gene Klingler.

The second motion was to delay the final decision for two weeks and have the input of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce housing study.



"The input of the chamber of commerce study should be considered before voting on this issue," said Commissioner Richard Hayter.

The third motion was to adopt the criteria submitted by Commissioner Kent Glasscock for determining the eligibility of the proposal for public assistance. The criteria consisted of four principles:

- K-State is required to provide convincing evidence of significant student housing needs that cannot be met, and that the Manhattan community would suffer a negative economic impact if the need remains unmet.
- Any project seeking incentives to meet the identified need must make a significant impact through a development plan involving one hundred or more living units.
- All projects must be completed and ready for occupancy by the end of 1990.
- The apartments have to assure 70 percent student population occupancy to receive abatement for the year, or 50 to 70 percent to receive two-thirds abatement. Apartments with 50 percent or below will not receive an abatement.

About 40 people attented the special meeting, many voicing displeasure with the tax abatement.

"I feel it is unfair to us apartment owners to give a tax abatement to certain people. It is unfair to change our free enterprise system," said Ruth Schrum, Manhattan resident and landlord.

Forum helps inform candidates about campus, student issues

By Nancy Prosser
Collegian Reporter

A forum intended to make candidates in the upcoming student government elections more informed of student issues and campus concerns was conducted Tuesday in the Union Little Theatre.

Five campus representatives concerned with separate issues expressed their views in short presentations before fielding questions from the students.

Judy Davis, director of the Women's Resource Center, spoke on the subject of sexual assaults on campus. She said campus safety should be an ongoing concern to student leaders and expressed a feeling that safety issues will fade if the incidents of assaults fade.

Davis said changing attitudes is the most prevalent problem in changing the occurrence of sexual assaults on campus.

Mike Lynch, assistant vice president of personnel services, discussed the funding of student health services.

He highlighted the closing of Lafene Student Health Center's in-patient services due to a lack of funding. Lynch said he sees no increase in health care fees this term. However, he predicts a zero balance for Lafene in fiscal year 1990 if the health fee does not increase.

"The last option we will implement is closing down services," Lynch said.

Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, talked about the inadequate funding of Farrell Library.

Farrell is the only library in the Big Eight Conference that is not a member of the Association of Research Libraries. It also has the smallest budget of any Big Eight library. It is 40 percent smaller than the No. 7 school.

Hobrock addressed a number of areas that he felt should be of concern to the candidates and to student government. He said the growth rate of the library is not keeping pace with other institutions. Farrell currently has 756 seats to accomodate a student body of 19,000. Farrell has the lowest number of open student hours in comparison to a study of its peer libraries.

"Student government needs to continue its work in student committees on the problems of Farrell and put pressure on the administration to alleviate these problems," Hobrock said.

Matt McMillen, field representative for the KSU Athletic Department, talked about the proposed student athletic fee.

The fee would be part of an overall plan to increase the athletic budget by $1.5 million over several years. K-State currently has the lowest athletic budget in the Big Eight. It lags behind No. 7, Oklahoma State University, by almost $2 million.

The revenue from the student athletic fee would be tracked so that students would know exactly where the money was spent.

"The athletic program is one of the most visible windows the University has. When it performs well, it reflects on and is good for the University as a whole," McMillen said.

Larry Garvin, director of facilities planning, spoke on renovation plans for Van Zile Hall. Renovations, if approved, will begin in the summer of 1989 and be finished by the following summer.

Renovations would represent a 7

Watson: buildings maintained as needed

By Matt Bunker
Collegian Reporter

Editor's Note: This is the third of a five-part series on campus facilities.

The campus buildings are being maintained as needed, despite inadequate funds for the task, said Jack Watson, assistant director of facilities maintenance.

Watson, who is responsible for the maintenance and operation of campus buildings as well as in-house construction, said workers in his department are "basically doing as well as (they) can with the amount of funding we receive.

"I don't see any maintenance neglect that is interfering with academics or research," he said.

Watson supervises 135 employees, including those who maintain the veterinary medicine facilities. The main campus and Veterinary Medicine Center receive separate allocations from the Board of Regents for maintenance, he said.

Watson said his budget for the main campus last year consisted of $1.8 million for salaries of full-time employees and $227,000 for "other operating expenses," a category that includes all purchases of materials used to maintain campus buildings.

Facilities Maintenance receives about 100 phone calls each day requesting minor repairs, Watson said. These items, which include things like faulty water faucets and air conditioning, each average 90 minutes to fix, he said.

Watson said he also devotes significant resources to preventive maintenance.

"We're on a 90-day cycle checking most heating, air conditioning, restrooms, handrails, doors, lights, etc.," Watson said.

Because more than 60 percent of the campus buildings were built in the 1960s or earlier, preventive maintenance is essential to keep things running smoothly, he said.

Watson said he does everything possible to minimize inconvenience to the campus community.

"I detest downtime. We don't want interruptions," he said. "If we have to shut down a system, it affects students and researchers. We don't want that."

Watson said building maintenance now requires more technical education than in the past. He is spending between between $30,000 and $40,000 this year for employees' private schooling.

"Technology is finally hitting the maintenance personnel of the University," he said.

The three newest buildings on campus are of the "high tech" variety and require extensive training for workers running the buildings, Watson said.

James L. Copeland, professor of chemistry and associate head of the Department of Chemistry, said that recent problems with the new Chemistry/Biochemistry building were not maintenance problems, but were defects in the original construction.

Copeland said improperly sealed sinks in one laboratory caused water to leak through the ceiling into the lab below, damaging ceiling tiles. Most problems of this nature in the new building have now been corrected, he said.

Maintenance crews on campus "have done their best with what they had to work with," Copeland said.

Watson said his department is doing a good job maintaining and replacing roofs on campus buildings. Four to five new roofs are being put on each year, he said.

When Watson became the assistant director in 1982, there was no full-time roofing crew, he said.

"Now we have a full-time supervisor, three full-time roofers and eight student roofers," Watson said.

The condition of campus pipes is a serious problem, he said. Deterioration and metal fatigue are common.

"Some are 50 years old. We've had to stretch due to inadequate funding. We need to replace all of the piping in Umberger Hall," he said.

Watson said he is asking for additional funding for pipe replacement in a special maintenance allocation.

But for Watson, the biggest frustration is inadequate funding to do all the maintenance he would like to see done.

"I'm not blind. I can see what (the buildings) need, but I also know what my bottom line is," he said.

Watson, who began in maintenance at K-State in 1967, said if he had more funds he

Peasants discover dinosaur

BEIJING — Peasants in southwestern China discovered a 29-foot-long dinosaur skeleton after a rainstorm washed away soil, the official Xinhua News Agency said Tuesday.

The 11½ -foot skeleton, which was well-preserved, was found in Yunnan province this month and excavated by archaeologists. The remains have not been identified or dated, Xinhua said.

Grenada invasion celebrated

ST. GEORGE'S, Grenada — A U.S. Navy band played "God Bless America" and sailors from the frigate USS Simpson marched in review Tuesday as Grenadians celebrated the fifth anniversary of a U.S. invasion that ousted a Marxist junta.

Navy Secretary William Ball III and other U.S. officials joined a crowd of about 1,500 for a military parade in the Queen's Park sports stadium to mark the invasion. Oct. 25 is now known as Thanksgiving Day on the island and is a national holiday.

The American marchers were joined by Grenada's police force and coast guard. A police unit marched in a formation that made the number 5, for the anniversary.

The United States, joined by seven Eastern Caribbean nations that provided token forces, sent 6,000 Marines and paratroopers to Grenada to expel a Marxist military junta that had seized power in a coup.

Man admits beer tampering

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. — A Jacksonville man, admitting that he put a mouse in a can of Coors beer, pleaded guilty Tuesday to charges of product tampering and extortion, made a public apology and was given 18 months in prison.

"I want to publicly admit that I caused a mouse to be placed in a can of Coors' beer and acknowledge the wrongdoing of that act," James N. Harvey told Circuit Judge R. Hudson Olliff and representatives of the Adolph Coors Co.

The judge sentenced Harvey to 18 months in prison on each of the counts and ordered that they be served concurrently. He was given until Nov. 1 to begin his sentence.

Assistant State Attorney R. McRae Mathis said after the one-hour hearing that the public apology to Coors was part of the plea agreement the state had negotiated with Harvey.

Legislation helps veterans

WASHINGTON — Saying America's debt to military men and women doesn't end "the day the uniform comes off," President Reagan signed legislation Tuesday giving veterans a Cabinet-level voice for the first time.

"I'm saying to all our veterans what I say to new Cabinet members: Welcome aboard!" said Reagan, the self-proclaimed enemy of an expanding federal government, who once suggested abolishing the departments of Education and Energy.

Sitting under a sparkling autumn sun in front of a columned building of the National War College at Fort McNair, the president signed into law the bill creating the Department of Veterans Affairs, effective March 15.

Spokesmen for veterans organizations applauded the elevation of veterans issues in the councils of government, but noted that the legislation offers no increases in compensation or improvements in health care.

Cooper T. Holt, executive director of the Washington office of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, said he recalled the day — last Nov. 10 — that Reagan signaled he had accepted Cabinet-level status for veterans.

"There were several of us over there at the White House, and we came prepared to make a case," Holt recalled in a telephone interview. "But when he came in, he apparently had decided against some of his advisers, and he said he wanted to do it."

Activists receive $1 million

ATLANTA — Forty-nine civil rights activists who were pelted with rocks and bottles when they marched into virtually all-white Forsyth County were awarded nearly $1 million by a jury that found the Ku Klux Klan responsible.

A verdict unsealed in U.S. District Court on Tuesday also found 11 individuals responsible for attacking the activists, who marched into the county north of Atlanta on Jan. 17, 1987, and were met by the counter-demonstrators, many of them KKK members or sympathizers.

The jury reached its verdict Oct. 5, but Judge Charles A. Moye Jr. ordered it sealed to give those who brought the lawsuit time to decide whether to join Atlanta City Councilman Hosea Williams, who wanted to drop it.

Williams, who helped organize the march and was among those who filed the lawsuit, urged toward the end of the trial that it be dropped because it would impoverish the families of KKK members.

He said Tuesday he would not take any money from the settlement.

"Irregardless of the court's decision, my decision not to accept one single penny of my white brothers' and sisters' possessions is a matter of conscience," Williams said.

Soviet icebreakers move closer to whales

By The Associated Press

BARROW, Alaska — With two Soviet icebreakers drawing near, rescuers Tuesday stepped up efforts to free two whales trapped nearly three weeks in an icy tangle.

The international rescue, called Operation Breakthrough, was scheduled to be put in motion Wednesday with the Soviet vessels, Eskimos with chainsaws and an ice-smashing tractor acting in concert.

Rescuers, meanwhile, received one bit of good news about the jumbled mass of ice.

They discovered that a pressure ridge apparently was not anchored to the sea bottom as initially was feared. A pressure ridge is where two opposing ice masses meet.

"It appears that most of the ridge has a current running through it, making it easier for the icebreakers to work," said Ron Morris, a biologist with the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

The California gray whales must get through the tangle if they are to reach an open lead, or pathway, through the ice. A lead is four miles away, but the nearest completely open water is 200 miles away in the Chukchi Sea.

The Admiral Makorov and the icebreaking cargo ship Vladimir Arseniev were 24 miles northeast of Point Barrow at 8 a.m., said Coast Guard spokesman Ken Freeze in Alameda, Calif.

Capt. Joseph McClelland Jr., skipper of the Coast Guard icebreaker Polar Sea which is based at Seattle, arrived in Barrow on Monday. He was assigned to act as liaison officer with the Soviets, but would also help guide the Soviets through the shallow water and foot-thick pan ice.

College forms recruiting panel

By Jody Hundley
Collegian Reporter

College of Agriculture administrators have formed an organization to improve recruiting techniques of incoming freshmen.

The Kansas State Ag Recruiting and Educating Prospective Students is a group of 60 freshmen, sophomores and transfer students assisting incoming agriculture students with career decisions, said Larry Erpelding, associate director of resident instruction within the college.

"The Ag REPS is an outgrowth of the Ag Ambassadors and allows freshmen, sophomores and transfer students the opportunity to organize activities and offer support to prospective students," Erpelding said.

The group organized after the All-University Open House last spring, said Jeff Bates, president of the organization and a sophomore in agriculture economics.

Ag REPS helps prospective students make a smoother transition into the college atmosphere since they have also experienced it, Erpelding said.

"They serve in a pre-administrative counseling role by helping friends from their home community make good decisions," Erpelding said. "The REPS provide advice about financial aid, housing, scholarships and general information about K-State and the College of Agriculture."

Bates said the group is helpful because of the ties the students have to each other.

"We have more ties with high schools in recruiting students for the College of Agriculture," Bates said.

Erpelding said Ag REPS still have hometown contacts — close friends that are in high school — since they have recently graduated from high school themselves.

The REPS are involved with off-campus recruiting at the Kansas State Fair, agricultural shows and will be at the National Future Farmers of America Convention in Kansas City, Mo., Nov. 9-12.

"The REPS will have a booth set up to answer questions. They'll be talking to prospective students who stop at the displays," Erpelding said.

Bates said the REPS co-sponsored the "Experience in Agriculture" with the Ag Ambassadors. Eighty-five high school seniors attended the event which was in the beginning of October.

Administration needs to study campus lighting

I walked into the room and took a seat close to the door. The instructor took attendance and soon the first speaker was behind the lectern. After a matter of minutes, it was third speaker's turn. The speaker blanketed the windows and closed the door, prompting me to anticipate a slide show. At once the lights went off and the speaker posed a question: "How would you like to walk across the campus in this light at 3:30 in the morning?"

I realized at once what the speaker was referring to. It was that same old lighting problem on campus. This has almost become a routine; the lighting issue is usually initiated after an assault or two each year, gains momentum during student elections and later dies out. No doubt the issue dies out, but the problem remains and will remain until the administration gives up its determination to believe that the problem does not exist.

It has been about a month since a person was assaulted in an inadequately lighted area near Seaton Hall. There has not been a single letter to the editor expressing concern about lack of lighting on campus. It is a pity to see that students believe that inadequate lighting affects only a small segment of students and not everybody on campus.

Inadequate lighting is a problem that potentially can affect each and every student on campus.

- It takes a single visit to campus at night to get assaulted or to get injured by running into something due to inadequate lighting.
- There is a good chance that one of your friends could be assaulted or hurt due to inadequate lighting.
- It could cost the University an expensive law suit if someone gets hurt as a consequence of inadequate lighting on campus and the administration is found negligent.

There are two questions at the heart of the problem. First, does inadequate lighting provide criminals with opportunities? Second, do scientific measurements show that a lighting problem exists?

The first question can be answered intuitively. There is a sense of insecurity in darkness because objects in the surroundings can't be seen. This opens the doors for criminal activity. The Illuminating Engineers Society Handbook, 1987, says, "Experience has proved that well-lighted alleys reduce the criminal's opportunity to operate and hide under the cover of the darkness."

Commentary

SHEIKH FAISAL RAZZAQ
Collegian Columnist

The second question concerns whether or not the campus actually has poorly lit areas and is one that has not yet been answered. I have no doubt, and neither do the people I have talked to, that at least some areas on campus are poorly lighted.

In a recent meeting with Clarence Waters, instructor for the Lighting and Building Electrical System class, I gained some insight in scientific aspects of the problem.

As I understood, the minimum standard for outdoor lighting as established by IES for a facility like K-State is ½ foot-candles of lateral light, which is approximately five times the light from a full moon on a cloudless night. After the eyes make some adjustments, one should be able to read a newspaper. Well, it is impossible to find the pathway on a dark night near the library after lights in the library are turned off, let alone read a newspaper.

It is a relief to know that not everybody on campus is scared to walk in dark areas of campus. In the October 7 issue of the Collegian, Lt. James Tubach, an investigating officer with the K-State police, said, "I've been through the area (alley on the north side of Seaton Hall) and I didn't feel the lighting was inadequate." I guess we ought to give police uniforms and handguns to students who visit campus late at night so they can feel as secure as Tubach feels.

It is unwarranted to demand more lighting on campus until a scientific study of the adequacy of the present lighting is completed. But, in any case, there is sufficient need that the administration should overhaul its policies concerning lighting maintenance. During a conversation with Philip Anderson, instructor in speech, I learned there is no procedure for reporting fused lamps on campus. The students, faculty and the police are responsible for the reporting. Well, the catalog does not list reporting of fused lamps as a part of my responsibilities, Anderson's contract does not specify it, and, I presume, unless the campus police dump some money to buy a computer to write parking tickets, the campus police are simply too busy writing tickets by hand to report fused lamps.

Even if the report compiled by the K-State chapter of IES suggests that there is adequate lighting in all areas on campus, which is highly improbable, there is still a need to define who is responsible to report lighting problems. As I understand, the maintenance budget is not broken down into different components. I suggest that we get our priorities straight and allocate a due share to maintenance of lighting on campus.

It seems logical that the administration should join with IES to study adequacy of lighting on campus. In this way, if there is a scientifically proven need for lighting in different areas of campus, a five-year plan for safe lighting could be put in place immediately.

K-State campaigns must avoid cut downs

Let the mud slinging begin.

Campaign speeches for student body president have recently begun, and so has the name calling, dirt digging and basic mud slinging.

Last Wednesday, student body presidential candidate Phil Nordhus spoke to the Alpha Chi Omega sorority.

During the speech, he emphasized the fact that he had experienced all types of living groups: residence hall, independent and fraternity.

Little did he realize that waiting in the wings was one of his opponents.

Robert Brown, manager for student body presidential candidate J.D. Llewelyn, introduced his candidate by saying he luckily never had to live in all types of living groups because he has never been kicked out of a living group.

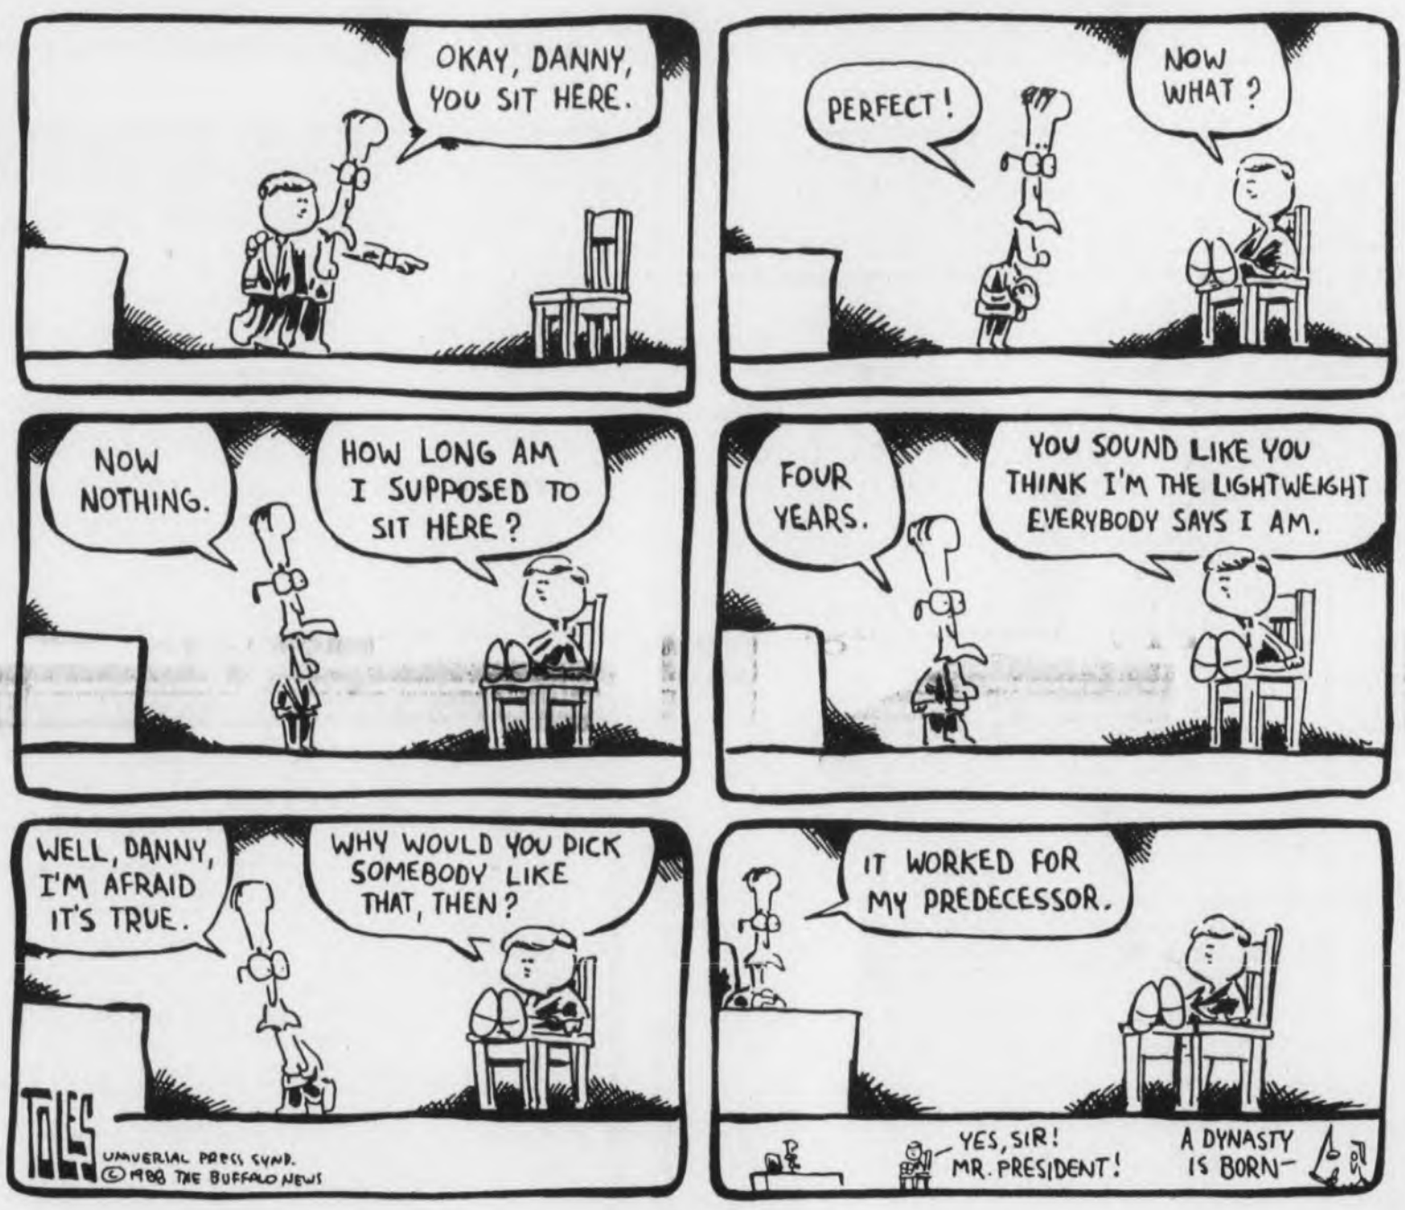
And the mud flew.

Nordhus never has been kicked out of a living group.

Although Brown claims to have said these words in a joking manner, it was still a statement in poor taste.

While America is accustomed to presidential candidates taking cheap shots at one another, this campus is not accustomed to the same behavior from student body candidates, nor should the campus tolerate it.

K-State is an institution of 19,000 students, not a nation of millions. Students at K-State have a variety of contacts with student candidates.



The candidates are tangible, not just images on a TV screen.

They are a lot like us.

Therefore, students are quickly offended at comments like Brown's.

If candidates continue to take pot shots at each other, they will surely do more damage to their own campaign than to their opponents' campaigns.

Sorry folks, it may work for the big boys in Washington, but it just doesn't fly at K-State.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR are always encouraged. Those which pertain to matters of campus and/or public interest are especially encouraged, and are given the highest priority.

Letters should be kept as brief as possible, preferably under 300 words. Those who cannot condense their opinions should consider submiting their letter in the form of a guest column. All letters are subject to editing for space, style and taste.

GUEST COLUMNS are also encouraged. The column should be no longer than two double-spaced, typed pages. If the submission is used as a column and not a letter to the editor, it will be accompanied by the author's photograph.

SEND SUBMISSIONS to the Collegian in Kedzie 116.

UNSIGNED EDITORIALS represent the consensus opinion of the Collegian's editorial board. Opinion columns do not necessarily reflect the opinions of the Collegian management, Student Publications, Inc. or the newspaper staff in general.

Letters

Traffic hazard

Editor,

A copy of a letter I have sent to the University Attorney, the University Facilities Division and the University Police is given below. I believe the safety of all those who drive on campus warrants publishing this letter where everyone can see it.

I also invite everyone who wants to join my protest against this safety hazard to send me your name and a brief note stating your concern. I shall file these notes until the hazard is corrected. If anyone is or has been involved in an accident at this site, I shall also be happy to give what help I can in any legal action which might arise.

Last March, I reported the driving hazard caused by the growing-ever-taller shrubs at the south exit of the upper Union parking lot to the KSU Police Department. I learned that there had already been at least one accident at that location and that the appropriate authorities had supposedly been notified about the hazard.

I then personally spoke with Tom Lee, head of the Grounds Maintenance Division of the University Physical Facilities, to report the same hazard and to suggest that some heavy trimming might alleviate the problem. He said he would 'check into it.'

Today is Oct. 10, more than half a year later. The bushes did get a cosmetic trimming recently, but it was not enough; the same shrubs are still blocking the view of drivers trying to make a southern exit from the upper Union parking lot.

Last week I spoke with Charles Beckom, captain of the KSU Police, about this traffic hazard, and he told me that intersection definitely violates official standards regarding visibility and traffic safety at intersections. He also said that he has been powerless to get the problem resolved.

Since it appears that K-State authorities are more concerned with campus beauty than with campus safety, I am writing this letter to inform you that, if anyone in my family is ever involved in an accident at that intersection, I shall take the matter to court. Since I have exercised due diligence in trying to get this hazard corrected, I expect to have no difficulty in convincing the court that the Univeristy is totally at fault.

Too busy for job

Editor,

I'd heard that the political candidates in K-State's Homecoming Parade were required to ride in open cars. So I was surprised, at first, to see Joe Knopp and his family on bicycles. Then I thought it over.

Sure, Joe and his family looked cute. But K-State hadn't got what it asked for. Again.

Why is it that this guy never seems to see what we need from a representative? Is he too busy looking toward his "statewide stature?" (Or is that "future?") Does he expect us to believe that our lots will automatically improve as his fortunes rise?

Wouldn't we be better served by someone who works primarily for us?

James Hamilton
associate professor of philosophy

Bad criticism of art

Editor,

Ah, John Skarda, it seems the Collegian reader has not had his fill of banal, pointless commentary. Thought we'd stockpile a bit, did we? But at least we've made it into the paper.

Skarda's Oct. 24 letter calls for the removal of King Hall's "Fork" sculpture, and its replacement with, what was it ... a marble dairy cow? ... A bronze John Wayne? It seems he feels threatened by the sculpture's Freudian connotations, a sort of campus moral assault, and yet he seems to enjoy providing the reader with much more explicit verbal images. Would anyone actually attach such meaning to the sculpture if some "concerned student" didn't write perennial letters to suggest it?

Probably not, I think, but if so, then there are a large number of other suggestive sculptures and menacing monuments which should come down as well. Good-bye Washington Monument! Farewell Liberty Memorial and Eiffel Tower! Into the bay with you, Transamerica Tower! Maybe Skarda can start a coalition.

But imagine for a moment a campus filled with Skardaist art. A large stone grainbasket by Shellenberger. A marble water molecule in front of Willard. And at Kedzie a twenty-foot William Randolph Hearst! Perhaps the new Vietnam Memorial could be a bronze Jane Fonda. We'll have no abstract art here!

By the way, Skarda, ever wondered why City Park's "Paul Bunyan" is holding the scythe? Maybe it's someone else ... hmm ... I don't know ... Johnny Kaw?

'Alien Nation' like sci-fi cop story

By Brad Atchison
Collegian Reviewer

Sometimes I just get a bad feeling in my stomach about things. Every once in a while a little voice whispers advice into my ear.

Most recently I heard this voice while watching the previews to the new science fiction cop movie "Alien Nation."

The voice just screamed "Noooo." Unfortunately, I didn't listen.

After receiving quite a bit of encouragement from my 15-year-old nephew, I found myself in front of "the big screen" watching "Alien Nation."

I could try to justify my presence at this show by claiming I was just doing my duty as a reviewer, but I would be lying. Deep down I was hoping to see some groovy aliens employing their superhuman powers to destroy the entire human race. I was sorely disappointed.

Watching "Alien Nation" was like watching a spaceman version of "Starsky and Hutch." The same old cop story dressed up in alien clothes.

The setting for the film is Los Angeles in the year 1991.

On the surface, there has been little change in the city. "Rambo VI" is playing in the theaters and L.A. cops are still hard at work, cruising the "Strip" in search of crime.

But there is something a little different about this picture.

It seems as though the planet Earth has a new race of beings called Newcomers. The Newcomers arrived in 1988 (something to look foward to) when their ship crash-landed in the Mojave desert.

The Newcomers came to earth on the run. Running from a world where they were slaves to a master race and slaves to a phenomenally addictive narcotic.

The narcotic was given to the Newcomers by their former masters as a reward for hard work. Addiction to this drug kept the Newcomers on a leash, but when our new neighbors escaped their slavery they also "threw the monkey off of their back."

In the course of "Alien Nation," we find out that drug smuggling is an intergalactic business. Several of the Newcomers have synthesized this deadly drug on Earth and intend to make a mint by getting the Newcomers hooked on their old habit.

The aliens in this film are just too much like people. They dress like we do. They think like we do. They act like we do. They even get addicted to drugs just like we do. The Newcomers are too predictable.

Heed the instinct that I ignored. If you can live without seeing another "shoot 'em up detective flick" don't waste your money on "Alien Nation."

KC couple indicted on drug charges

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A Kansas City contractor and his wife have been indicted by a federal grand jury on charges of conspiracy, drug trafficking, firearms violations and money laundering.

The goverment is also seeking the forfeiture of a $2 million shopping mall, a $100,000 house, the stock at a dress shop and other property owned by the defendants, Abdul Nur Shakur, 42, and his wife, Bahiya Hiba Shakur, 32. Authorities contend that the property was obtained with profits from drug trafficking.

The 21-count indictment, returned last week and opened Monday, also charged Shakur's brothers, Keith Tyler, 29; Larry Tyler, 38; and Terry L. Tyler, 33; and Kim Randolph Lucas, 30, with conspiracy and other violations.

Panel recalls reaction to Nixon's Landon Lecture

By Stuart Puls
Collegian Reporter

Just as President Nixon's 1970 Landon Lecture on Public Issues caused mixed reactions among those attending, so too did a panel discussion on the same topic Tuesday afternoon in Ackert Hall.

The panel consisted of Stephen Ambrose, professor at the University of New Orleans and former Dwight D. Eisenhower professor of war and peace at K-State at the time of Nixon's speech; John Biggs, director of the Manhattan Arts Council and former K-State student at the time of the speech; and Joseph Hajda, professor in political science and former chairman of the Landon Lecture series.

Also on the panel were William Stamey, former dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, and John McCulloh, professor of history.

Nixon spoke for the Landon Lecture series on Sept. 16, 1970, before 15,000 people in Ahearn Field House. Nixon's coming to K-State and his speech were very controversial.

"(The atmosphere) was like a pep rally. The pep band was playing the fight songs and students were chanting their phrases. It was just like at a basketball game," Biggs said.

"It was chilling to sit there, as someone who disapproved of Nixon, and be swept up in the hoopla and hysteria of the speech," said Kent Donovan, professor of history.

Although Nixon's audience, including anywhere from 20 to 40 hecklers, never got ugly, Biggs said it was scary sometimes.

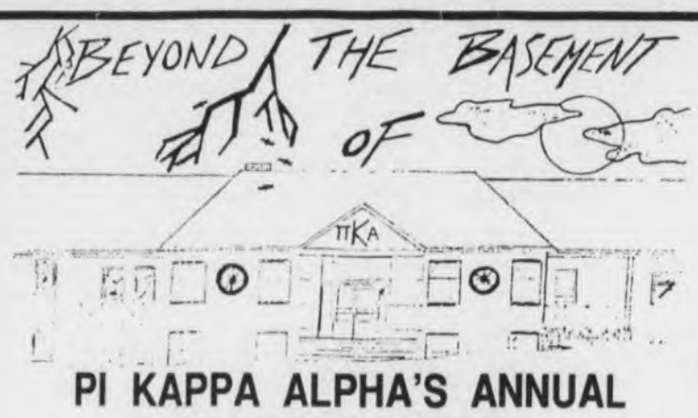
"I remember that a guy next to me held up a sign that said 'end the war,' while the guy next to him held up a 'we support Nixon' sign," Biggs said. "An armed guard came rushing up to the guy with the 'end the war' sign, ripped it out of his hands and tore it up, telling the guy 'You know signs aren't allowed in here,' while doing nothing to the guy who supported Nixon."

Students were told in advance of the speech that all signs and posters were prohibited and violators would be punished.

"It was a very disturbing moment in my undergraduate time," Biggs said.

Nixon received several standing ovations for comments made about K-State and Kansas in general.

"Nixon knew, because of an aide, that the audiences at KSU often give standing ovations to even the meaningless things, and (Nixon) milked the crowd on this," Stamey said.



Ambrose, who resigned his post at K-State shortly after Nixon's speech, said he felt Nixon used K-State, and the people in the audience allowed themselves to be used by Nixon.

Ambrose said he was unhappy with what Nixon had to say.

"Violence was going on everywhere around the nation, and yet he was up there telling us the violence is wrong, when he wasn't doing much about it. I had to respond," Ambrose said.

Celebrating its first anniversary

THE MALL

The Manhattan Town Center as seen from the top of the KS hill east of Manhattan. In 1989 the Town Center will be implementing a stronger marketing program aimed more at K-Staters.

Just more than a year after its grand opening, the Manhattan Town Center has created a link between itself and the downtown retail district that is important, according to city and mall officials.

The connection between a city's mall and its major downtown retail district is an ongoing experiment in Mahnattan which is being watched carefully throughout the country, said Chris Heavey, manager of the Manhattan Town Center.

"How we entwine with Manhattan is important," he said.

The Manhattan Main Street Project is designed to promote revitalization of the downtown sector. Kim Brechesien, project manager for the program, agrees with Heavey that the link between the two could have a major impact in other cities.

"We are being watched very closely," Brechesien said. "We receive calls from throughout the country, from city officials and developers, wanting to know how the project is doing."

She said the callers are interested in how the mall has affected downtown business, and how well downtown and the mall are working together.

"The secondary measure of Manhattan Town Center is its interaction with downtown and the rest of Manhattan," Heavey said. "It is important to make Manhattan Town Center react with the rest of Manhattan's retail business.

The future of the mall relies on what Manhattan does with its marketplace and the mall's ability to deal with the other retail centers in Manhattan, Heavey said.

"Two years ago we didn't have the Salina and West Ridge malls," he said. "If we don't do our job, they will wake up and take our market."

As a major regional core of retail business, Manhattan is going to open up the focus on outside markets. In order to open up the focus, Heavey said, the retailers must attract customers from the entire community — students, military personnel, and local community members — into the Manhattan market.

Business owners within the Town Center focused on the military market during the past year with their "Military Mania" promotion, which began last June.

"The promotion was such a success, we decided to keep it as an ongoing campaign," said Mickey Thompson, advertising and marketing director for the Manhattan Town Center. "Merchants credit 70 percent of the purchases to the promotion during the highest day of sales during the campaign."

Thompson said that in 1989 Manhattan Town Center will be implementing a stronger marketing program aimed at K-Staters.

"Manhattan retailers must become part of a regional concept, so we can go after the marketplace," Heavey said.

During the next year, Heavey said, he wants to help stores outside the mall expand their marketplace.

Manhattan Town Center can be credited with an increase in the amount of local sales tax revenues generated, said Kurt Wood, director of finances for the city.

"This year, with only nine payments received, our local sales tax revenues are up by 14.5 percent over this same period last year," he said. "Year to date, we have received over $400,000 in additional revenue."

The Manhattan Town Center, in its first year, has met the city's expectations, said Jim Pearson, assistant city manager.

"The intent of the mall was to preserve the downtown area as the historical center of retail business in Manhattan," he said. "The things we learned in the development of the mall are being used in other parts of the community in stimulating economic development."

The mall has exceeded some of the expectations the merchants had about it, Thompson said.

"The mall is now about 75 percent occupied, and growing," she said. "We were 65 percent full when we opened a year ago and have added 12 new stores."

Scot's Ltd, a women's clothing store, is the only major store that has left the mall, Thompson said. However, the loss has not been that dramatic, because four Scot's stores closed around the country, and the company filed for bankruptcy.

Eleven seasonal temporary stores left the mall following the holidays, and left the appearance that the mall lost a number of stores, Heavey said. Those losses, however, were expected because the stores only had two or three month leases.

Business for the upcoming holiday season looks good, he said. Eight of the 13 slots for temporary stores during the Christmas season are already filled.

"Mall retailers are pleased with the first year's sales, but cautious," Heavey said.

This caution, he said, should be relieved when retailers see how sales are over a full-year period.

Some retailers, he said, were a bit worried over the summer, when the students were gone and support for the mall was down.

"I'm very pleased with the mall's year-to-date sales per square foot," said Heavey. "Sales are about $165 per square foot and do not include the two anchor stores, Dillard's and JCPenney. We can still make the projected 1988 sales per square foot of $175, since the busiest shopping season is yet to come."

But, Heavey said, Manhattan's retail area is a secondary market — not part of a large metropolitan area. The average sales per square foot in a secondary market is about $140.

Randy Shank, first-timers chairman for the State of Kansas Jaycees, plants a mannequin leg in the Jaycees' haunted house graveyard. The haunted house is in the mall and opened Tuesday.

Brady Roche, St. Marys, plays a miniature pinball game in the Kay Bee Toys store in the Town Center. Eight of the 13 slots for temporary stores for the Christmas season are already filled.

Typhoon takes toll on Philippine shore

By The Associated Press

MANILA — Rescuers said Tuesday they had found only 15 survivors from the 500 people on a ship sunk by Typhoon Ruby, which hit shore with 140 mph winds that flattened thousands of homes and took at least 97 lives.

Darkness and bad weather forced an overnight suspension of the search for survivors of the Dona Marilyn, which replaced the Dona Paz on the Sulpicio Lines run between Manila and Tacloban. The Dona Paz sank last Dec. 20 after a collision off Mindoro Island and more than 3,000 people perished.

More than 100,000 Filipinos were made homeless by Ruby, which was reported in the South China Sea late Tuesday, heading west with top winds of about 100 mph.

In suburban Manila, U.S. and Philippine helicopters rescued hundreds of people stranded on rooftops and in trees by the flooding Marikina River.

Coast Guard officials said the 2,845-ton passenger liner sank Monday in the Visayas Sea about 300 miles southeast of Manila.

It was carrying 451 passengers and 60 crew members from Manila to Tacloban on Leyte Island when it radioed a distress call, said Carlos Go, general manager of Sulpicio Lines.

Lt. Rey Esguerra of the coast guard station in Cebu said rescuers had found 11 survivors on Maripipi Island and another small island, and four people were found alive in the water.

Minority club to sponsor workshop

By Mark Rader
Collegian Reporter

Minority Business Students in Action will sponsor a resume and interviewing workshop at 8 tonight in Calvin 102.

The workshop will be held by the faculty and is open to the public. The group sponsoring the event is a new organization designed to promote and acclimate minority students to the business world, said Kay Stewart, assistant dean in the College of Business Administration.

Janice Coburn, senior in marketing and president of the group, said the purpose for starting the group was to increase minority involvement in the College of Business.

"Minority students were not interacting as much as other students and were missing out on many opportunities available to them," Coburn said.

The group, which is not limited to minorities, is designed to provide an area of support for the students, help them to identify with each other and to develop a better network between themselves, faculty and other students, Stewart said.

The group is trying to do this through workshops, bringing in speakers and taking field trips to various businesses. This should expose students to the diverse educational opportunities within the business college and the working environment, she said.

"I really believe working with them will offer a lot to the College of Business and can help them meet their career objectives," Stewart said. "I am excited about the organization."

Stewart said the group wants to work with the other business clubs to get minorities more involved with the college activities and to interact more with the faculty.

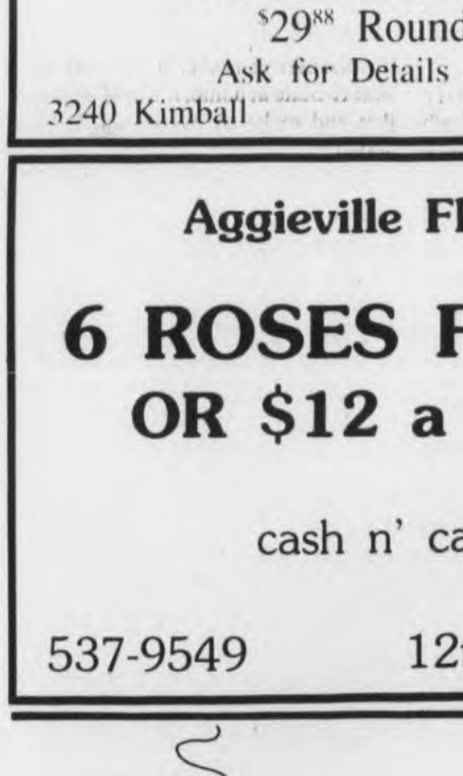
"(They) would like to create a favorable environment to encourage other minorities to come to K-State by giving minorities a more visible identity," Stewart said.

Coburn said the turnout at the first meeting was not quite as large as they had hoped, but more interest has been shown recently.

Most of the promotion for the group is done by word of mouth to about 150 minority students in the College of Business, Coburn said.

The group would like to have meetings about twice a month next semester.

"We are still trying to get things together," Coburn said.



In November, they are planning to visit Hallmark Cards in Kansas City for added exposure to a large corporation, Coburn said.

Craig Wilson, shortstop for the white team, tries to stop a throw from the catcher as he tries to tag a runner at second base Tuesday at Frank Myers Field. The purple team won the game 3-2. The annual purple and white scrimmages will be played all week at 3 p.m.

'Cats play in their own Series

Guest managers make coaching debuts

By Chris Hays
Sports Writer

The purple squad took a 2-0 advantage over the white team Tuesday afternoon in the third annual Wildcat baseball World Series being played this week at Frank Myers Field.

Both games have gone down to the wire. Monday, the white team lost the lead in the bottom of the ninth inning as the purple scored four runs to win, 9-8.

And yesterday, the purple team again rallied late. Tied 2-2, freshman walk-on Rod Lee led off the last half of the seventh with a pinch-hit single and then stole second. Senior center fielder Sean Collins then lined out to the shortstop, who nearly threw Lee out at second for a double play. However, the shortstop's errant throw rolled all the way into foul territory near right field, allowing Lee to score the winning run.

Making this week's scrimmages a little more interesting has been the use of celebrity managers. Coach Mike Clark has asked several media personalities and administration personnel to act as coaches during the five-day, season-ending series.

Athletic Director Steve Miller, who was replaced by sports information intern Kevin Klintworth later in the game due to a schedule conflict, coached the purple team to victory Monday over the white squad's coach, sports information director Kenny Mossman.

Tuesday, Topeka Capital-Journal sports editor Bob Hentzen guided the purple team to triumph over "The voice of the Wildcat Radio Network," Mitch Holthus.

"It was a lot of fun even though I didn't know what I was doing," Hentzen said. "I thought we were running the bunt play on that last one (Collins' line drive)."

Hentzen is a 1954 graduate of Oklahoma. He worked for the Daily Oklahoman for two years, followed by a two-year stint with the military. In 1958, Hentzen was hired by the Capital-Journal and has been sports editor since 1968. Hentzen has also served as president of both the Football and Basketball Writers of America.

Holthus graduated from K-State in 1979. From there, he took a job as sports director at a Pratt radio station for three years and has been the voice of the Wildcat basketball and football radio networks since 1983.

The play in the scrimmages was serious, at times, on the field. But off the field, the players took semi-serious jabs at each other throughout the game. And the players were not the only ones, as the celebrity coaches got in on the act afterward.

"I had the utmost respect for Bob Hentzen, but now I think I'm going to have to re-evaluate that opinion," Holthus joked. "He had his kids throwing at my players."

On the serious side though, Holthus had a lot of good things to say for what Clark has done for the Wildcat baseball program in his three years as coach.

"People don't realize what Mike Clark has done for this program," Holthus said. "If it takes something like (celebrity events) for the program to get some exposure, then I'm all for it.

Wednesday, Manhattan Mercury sports editor Mark Janssen will coach the purple team against KSAL radio personalities Jim Rose and Chris Knight. Thursday, Collegian columnist Dave Svoboda will lead the purple squad against WIBW-TV sportscaster Brad Stauffer. Coaches are yet to be announced for Friday's game.

The three remaining games will start at 3 p.m. at Frank Myers Field and will be six-inning contests.

Sunflower State rivalry renews tonight in Ahearn

By Russ Ewy
Sports Writer

It looks to be a tooth and nail fight as the Sunflower Series between K-State and the University of Kansas is set to begin tonight.

The match is scheduled to get underway at 7:30 p.m. in Ahearn Field House.

Last year, more than 2,000 fans gathered at Ahearn to watch the Wildcats defeat the Jayhawks in five games in women's volleyball.

The intrastate rivalry has been just as hot for volleyball as it has been for the other athletic programs, and tonight the Jayhawks make their first trip back to Ahearn since that match.

"This is the first time this year ... that Kansas State and Kansas have met and we would like to set the tone for football and basketball."
—Scott Nelson volleyball coach

"The competition is real fierce. Kansas has always played at a higher level for this match and we have played well, too. It should be a great contest," K-State coach Scott Nelson said.

"This is the first time this year, from a varsity athletic point of view, that Kansas State and Kansas have met and we would like to set the tone for football and basketball."

Over the past several years, the matches quite often last the full five games. The last time K-State played KU, the Wildcats were upset in the Big Eight Conference tournament in five games.

Although the Jayhawks are 4-17 overall and K-State is 12-10, both schools have their eyes set on fourth place and a trip to the Big Eight's postseason tournament next month in Salina.

"Kansas is a very critical match for us," Nelson said. "We have to begin making some headway in the conference and this would be the ideal place to start.

"Traditionally, they're a good ball control team. They don't make a lot of errors and keep the ball in play. In order to come out as a winner in a match like that, you have to keep your unforced errors low," he added.

K-State is coming off perhaps its best weekend of the season. The Wildcats lost to 12th-ranked Oklahoma in five games at Norman Friday, before sweeping Oral Roberts and Tulsa on Saturday.

"We're back to where we want to be," Nelson said. "We had chances to win the Oklahoma match and didn't do it. Losing to Oklahoma in five tells you the kind of volleyball we played."

Shawnee Call had 21 kills against the Sooners as she led the 'Cats over the weekend. In the three matches, the senior from Ellsworth elevated her hitting percentage from .244 to .261.

K-State and KU have both defeated Iowa State in league competition and that gives Jayhawks' coach Frankie Albitz some hope. Her squad is coming off losses to league-leading Nebraska and to Colorado, another first-division team.

"Nebraska pretty much took care of us, but the Colorado match gave me some hope," Albitz said. "We were competitive in two of those games.

"This game is real important to us (in the Big Eight race) since we lost to Missouri at home. If we were to beat K-State at home, it would negate that and make us even again," she added.

Steroid use by athletes harmful, authorities say

By Kelly Campbell
Collegian Reporter

Athletes use steroids because they are afraid, said Dr. Guy Smith, director of sports medicine at Lafene Student Health Center.

"People are afraid of losing, of not being competitive. People are afraid they are not good enough," he said.

The main reason athletes use steroids is to improve muscle strength and increase muscle mass, said Karl Rinehardt, professor in physical education and leisure studies and an exercise physiologist. Both happen with steroid use, he said.

"This is the good news. The bad news is that there is a direct relationship between steroid use and cardiovascular disorders," Rinehardt said. "Steroids cause cancerous tumors in the liver. People who use steroids are flirting with early death."

Steroids also change the structure of the connective tissue, he said. Tendons become thicker and stronger, but lose elasticity which makes them easier to tear. In addition, the connective tissue does not gain strength at the same rate as the muscle.

He added that steroid users become moody and extremely aggressive, develop acne, retain water, and go bald. Initially, sex drive increases, but after prolonged use it decreases.

Steroid use is harmful to both female and male athletes.

"When females take the drug, they grow body hair on their face, legs and arms," Rinehardt said. "They develop male pattern baldness and their voices get deeper because steroids enlarge the larynx. Their skin gets thicker and darker and they develop menstrual irregularities.

"There is almost no medical reason to take steroids. I have never given anyone steroids.
—Guy Smith director of sports medicine

"Men produce very little or no sperm when they use steroids. Their own production of testosterone decreases. Their breasts enlarge," he added.

Though it is believed steroids increase muscle mass, Smith said scientifically there is no absolute evidence that it actually does. Rinehardt agreed.

"It is now thought that the increased muscle strength and mass is due to the aggressive behavior of the user and his approach to weight training," Rinehardt said. "Athletes have to train to get stronger whether they take steroids or not. The steroids just make them more aggressive and give them more drive."

"There is almost no medical reason to take steroids," Smith said. "I have never given anyone steroids. Apparently they are easy to get. People say they go to this pharmacy or doctor and have no problem."

According to University authorities, there is not a significant problem with athletes using steroids at K-State.

"I think some college athletes use steroids. The athletes who are trying to move up to another level are the ones who are most likely to use them," Smith said.

"When the professionals use steroids, then college athletes want to use them, and when the college athletes use them, then the high school kids think they have to," said strength and conditioning coach Jerry Palmieri.

"I don't know where we are here. I will say I do not think we have as many as what publicity says the national norms are," he added. "My feeling is that it's cheating. It is against rules of competition. I feel you need to abide by the rules of the game."

To deter use by the K-State athletes he trains, Palmieri said he stresses the adverse effects of steroid use. From an athletic standpoint, it is important for an athlete to maintain his strength. If athletes gain strength naturally, they can keep their strength level high throughout the season.

"When you take steroids you gain weight and get stronger, but you cannot use the drugs indefinitely," Palmieri said. "When you stop using steroids, you rapidly lose strength."

The athletic department's drug testing results are kept confidential, so coaches do not know when one of the athletes have tested positive and are undergoing drug counseling. However, Palmieri said there are signs that indicate steroid use, such as rapid gains in lifting strength and physical changes like increased body weight, water retention, and acne.

Palmieri said if he thinks one of his athletes is using steroids, he talks to the athlete and tells him of the adverse effects.

"I may be able to reach him," he said. "I could tell him it is illegal and

K-State plans revision of drug testing policy

By Kelly Campbell
Collegian Reporter

A revised drug screening program will soon be completed for the K-State athletic department, according to Carl Cramer, K-State's chief athletic trainer.

A committee composed of athletic department members, physicians and drug and alcohol counselors is overhauling the current program, with the main emphasis being shifted from drug testing to drug education, he said.

"The purpose of the drug screening program is to protect the health of college athletes and ensure fair play," Cramer said.

The committee is concerned that the program is equitable to and for the athletes and that their rights are protected, he said.

According to studies, drug screening programs do work, Cramer said.

"A drug screening program does several things," said Bill Arck, director of alcohol and other drug education services at K-State. "It identifies individuals with a problem, is an incentive for athletes not to use drugs, and gives the college athlete a reason to say no to drugs."

There will not be any sweeping changes in the revised program, Cramer said. It will be more comprehensive in some areas and will encompass changes in the NCAA policy.

The current program calls for athletes to be tested when they enter the sports program, and random testing throughout the year. Cramer said they are looking at random testing versus probable cause.

It costs $24 to test for street drugs and recreational substances and $75 to test for steroids, Cramer said.

"To bring in a 100-pound cross country runner and test for steroids just isn't showing fiscal responsibility," he said. "My philosophy has changed to going toward the educational aspects. More department money will be spent on drug education and less on drug testing.

NEW YORK — Nolan Ryan, baseball's all-time strikeout leader, was one of nine players to file for free agency on Tuesday, bringing the total to 14 since the period for filing began last Friday.

Other pitchers to file Tuesday were Mike Moore of Seattle and Ted Power of Kansas City.

High school field to be named

CLAY CENTER, Kan. — Clay Center's high school football stadium will be named for former coach Otto D. Unruh at halftime ceremonies during a game with Council Grove on Nov. 4.

Unruh, 89, of Newton, will receive a plaque. A temporary sign will be in place the night of the ceremony, with a permanent one to be installed later. Unruh spent 22 of his 25 years of high school coaching at Clay Center, and his football teams there had a combined record of 126-65-8, winning six titles in the Class A-A Central Kansas League. His 1950, 1956 and 1957 teams were undefeated.

LaRussa named AL's best manager

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Tony La Russa, who piloted the Oakland Athletics to a club-record 104 victories and the American League pennant, was named AL Manager of the Year Tuesday by the Baseball Writers Association of America.

It was the second time La Russa won the award. He also was honored in 1983, when he led the Chicago White Sox to the AL West title.

La Russa, 44, edged Boston manager Joe Morgan by 14 points in balloting by a committee made up of two writers from each AL city. La Russa received 103 points, compared with 89 for Morgan and 37 for Sparky Anderson of the Detroit Tigers.

La Russa got 15 first-place votes, six more than Morgan, who took over the struggling Red Sox at midseason and led the club to the AL East title. The only other managers receiving first-place votes were Anderson, with three, and Milwaukee's Tom Trebelhorn with one.

Each first-place vote was worth five points. Second-place votes were worth three points each, while a third-place vote counted as one point.

The A's improved by 23 victories in 1988 and won the division by 13 games over the defending World Series champion Minnesota Twins. They were heavily favored to win the Series, but were upset in five games by the Los Angeles Dodgers.

Oakland finished first in the league in pitching with a 3.43 earned run average, second in homers with 156, and third in defense. The A's won a franchise-record 14 straight games in April and May and set a Bay area attendance record, drawing 2,287,335 fans to the Oakland Coliseum.

La Russa has a 752-683 record, or .524 winning percentage, in 10 seasons as a major league manager.

Like a lot of successful managers, La Russa was a mediocre player. He had a career batting average of .199 in 132 games as a utility infielder in the major leagues.

A native of Tampa, Fla., La Russa made his big league debut at age 18 with the Kansas City A's in 1963. He played with Oakland from 1968-71 and finished his career with Atlanta and the Chicago Cubs.

His managerial career began in 1978 when he took over the White Sox' Class AA team in Knoxville, Tenn. The team went 53-25, earning La Russa a promotion to Chicago's coaching staff.

He was named manager of the White Sox' Class AAA team in Iowa in 1979 and took over the Chicago job in August. The White Sox finished fifth that year and the next, third in 1981 and 1982, and first in 1983.

The White Sox were tied for first at the All-Star break in 1984 before plummeting to fifth. La Russa was fired after the team finished third in 1985 and started the next season 26-38.

La Russa joined the A's on July 7, 1986, managing the team to a 45-34 record that season and 81-81 in 1987. He makes $350,000 a year on a contract running through 1989.

Dance class teaches art, history of steps

By Christina Doherty
Collegian Reporter

Students enrolled in Dance as an Art Form learn more than individual steps and dance techniques. They learn how those steps were first performed and why.

"The course is trying to define dance as an art form as opposed to a recreation form," said Judith Quirk, instructor of dance and the teacher of the class.

In the class, students are taken through the history of dance at a beginning level. They study it from the beginning of humankind through contemporary times. The roles of different dances in society are also a part of the class.

For example, modern dance grew out of a rebellion against ballet as a result of changing attitudes at the turn of the 20th century. Ballet originally started during the Renaissance as an aristocratic art for the royal court.

The class is taught in a lecture format, and Quirk uses videotapes to let the class visualize the topics being discussed. One video Quirk uses explains the importance of primitive dance forms and shows the dances of the aborigines. It explains how people were inspired by primitive dance forms.

Quirk said she relates the discussion to topics students are familiar with — like the problem of drugs and athletes, and the effects of drugs on dancers.

Quirk said dancers may use drugs to deal with some of the same tensions and pressures athletes may feel when they perform and compete in a competitive field.

"I think the fact that she ties it into things that we already know, and we can tie in with our experiences helps. When she talks about some of her relevant experiences, it helps because it makes it something not just out of a textbook," said Michael Townsley, sophomore in dance.

State prison criticized in court

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Two consultants criticized medical services for inmates at a Hutchinson prison as inadequate in federal court Tuesday, while the institution's director denied allegations of discrimination against black prisoners.

Lawyers for prisoners at the Kansas State Industrial Reformatory continued their efforts to show overcrowding there has made conditions so bad that they violate inmates' constitutional rights. They have asked U.S. District Judge Richard Rogers of Topeka to order the state to remove inmates from the reformatory to reduce overcrowding.

Two consultants who toured the reformatory described the medical and mental health services there as "deliberately indifferent" to inmates' needs — meaning a lack of services leads to violations of inmates' rights to be protected from cruel and unusual punishment, guaranteed by the Eighth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution.

However, the prison's director, Robert Hannigan, attempted to rebut some of the criticism.

Hannigan also disputed testimony presented Monday by Mark Orr, a legal aid attorney, who said many black inmates have complained the prison has an unwritten policy of not allowing black inmates to share cells with inmates of other races. Orr said he knew of only two cases in which a black inmate shares a cell with a white inmate.

"The cellhouses are integrated. The shops, the educational programs — the institution — are totally integrated," Hannigan said. "He could have brought the facts to us if he had them."

Hannigan also said he gets a "considerable number" of complaints from white inmates who are not allowed to cell with other white inmates of their choosing. Orr had said black inmates said they were forced to go through a stringent review process to be allowed to share a cell with a white inmate.

"Would this type of review have taken place if two white inmates wanted to cell together?" Chuck Simmons, the Department of Corrections' chief counsel, asked Hannigan.

Hannigan answered, "That is correct."

Lawyers for both sides said they expect testimony to conclude Wednesday, as scheduled.

The case actually involves three state prisons: the reformatory, the Kansas Correctional Institution at Lansing and the Kansas State Penitentiary in Lansing. However, both the state and lawyers for KCIL inmates have agreed that the state should limit the population at KCIL to its operating capacity.

The litigation stems from a 1978 suit filed by penitentiary inmates, which resulted in a 1980 order requiring the state to reduce overcrowding and improve conditions.

"PERFECTION."
Richard Corliss, Time

Set in a seaside town on the south coast of England in the 1950's and shot in sunny flesh tones, this english movie has a satirical yet dreamlike texture. The film is about an uncontrollably ribald girl named Lynda who flaunts her sexuality the same way she flaunts "taboo" words. The film is based on the early years of Cynthia Payne, who was the inspiration for the madam in the other British hit film, PERSONAL SERVICES. Rated R.
Wednesday, October 26, 7:30 p.m., Forum Hall and Thursday, October 27, 3:30 p.m., Little Theatre and 7:30 p.m., Forum Hall. All shows $1.75; KSU ID Required.

To any showing of the film "WISH YOU WERE HERE" bring a post card that says "Wish You Were Here" and get 50¢ off the $1.75 admission price!

would "give the University one whale of a face-lifting." Curbs, sidewalks, ceilings and painting are among the items he'd like to see improved if funding were available.

Watson said he has a deferred maintenance list that amounts to about $10 million. These are items that can't be fixed under the current budget, he said.

"We know the condition of ceilings, walls and floors in every building," he said.

H. Gene Wiley, maintenance superintendent for the Department of Housing, said that service is the basis of his department.

"We sell service," he said. "We are here to serve the residents. We're going to be pleasant about it and do an excellent job."

Wiley said he is responsible for maintenance of "any place a student lives on campus, including ... food centers."

Housing maintenance is very busy, Wiley said. As buildings age, they require more maintenance. Haymaker Hall, which is 21 years old, is the newest facility the Department of Housing maintains, Wiley said.

Wiley supervises more than 100 full-time employees, including housekeeping employees, he said. Those employees include carpenters, plumbers, electricians and even an upholsterer, Wiley said. The Department of Housing is the only state agency that has its own upholsterer, he said.

The president of Haymaker Hall, Jeff Martin, said the residence hall was being properly maintained. Martin, a sophomore in electrical engineering, said the only real problem in Haymaker is the elevators breaking down — usually due to vandalism.

When this occurs, he said, housing maintenance responds quickly.

"Things are usually fixed as soon as possible," he said.

percent increase in housing costs for the next year, said Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement. K-State's housing costs are the lowest in the Big Eight.

Troy Lubbers, student body president, spoke about the Educational Opportunity Fund.

"The forum gave candidates a chance to ask experts their opinions so we can get a different view of the issues to aid in making (our) views encompass the wider majority of campus," said Mike Cormaci, senior in agricultural ecconomics and candidate for student body president.

At a meeting in McCain Auditorium, in which the hecklers were given a chance to speak their mind with Hajda, Ambrose called Nixon a liar. It was the controversy surrounding Ambrose's response that caused his resignation.

Ambrose said he never was threatened or pressured by the administration to resign. He said he was tempted to stay, but that it was made clear that he wasn't wanted here.

"The administration never threatened me with my job for what I said."

will hurt him in the long run, but the bottom line is the kid wants to succeed. He doesn't care about what it will do to him 20 years from now."

Rinehardt said that several years ago, Olympic contenders were asked what they would do if they could take a drug that would assure them of a gold medal in the Olympics but would kill them within six months.

"Eighty-five percent of them said they would take the drug.

"My personal feeling is that Americans are absorbed with winning," Rinehardt said.

Kansas elm becomes largest of kind in U.S.

Tree bears Indian name

By Amy Rosebrough
Collegian Reporter

Named after a Kansas Indian, the Louis Vieux has been declared the largest American elm tree in the United States by the American Forestry Association.

Tuesday, the Louis Vieux offically unseated a Virginia tree that has succumbed to Dutch elm disease.

The Louis Vieux stands alone on the edge of a wheat field three miles northeast of Wamego on the Vermillion River. Its exact age is unknown.

Gary Naughton, state extension forester, estimated 10 years ago that the tree is about 250 years old, but he changed his mind this year after examining a broken off limb. He now estimates the tree to be about 125 years old.

"We're more concerned with how long it is going to live," he said.

There is no way to do a core sample of the tree's trunk because of the tree's thickness, and the trunk is hollow, Naughton said.

Homer Parshall, one of the first owners of the land, cleared the land for farming but left the tree for shade, Naughton said.

Parshall named the tree after it was determined to be one of the oldest trees in the state. Several people suggested that his name be used, but Parshall said he only owned the land. He suggested the tree be named after Louis Vieux, an Indian who had the land before it was settled by whites.

When Parshall died, he deeded the tree to the state. Because of this, it is now a one-tree state forest, Naughton said.

The health of the Louis Vieux always concerns the forestry department, but the state can do little to protects the tree's health, he said.

When branches fall off the tree, they must be picked up because the dead wood attracts beetles that carry Dutch elm disease.

Naughton said the department has not had to spray the tree to eradicate the beetles because they have not posed a serious problem.

Debaters cite safety concerns

By Becky Jones
Collegian Reporter

Ten candidates for student body president squared off Wednesday night in the Heritage Room of Kramer Food Center for the first formal campaign debate.

The most prominent issues discussed were campus safety, an athletic fee and funding for Lafene Student Health Center and Farrell Library.

The debate was structured, with one to two minutes allotted for each candidate to respond to formal questions. The audience was allowed to ask questions of the candidates at the end of the formal debate.

Candidates Brenda Halinski, Sally Howard-Clayton, Tom Jones, Scott King, Phil Kirk, J.D. Llewelyn, John McIntyre and Phil Nordhus agreed the best way to make the campus safe is to educate students and intensify awareness of potential problems, such as sexual harassment and walking alone on campus.

Candidate Laurian Cuffy said the best way to increase safety on campus is to fix the lighting system and set up a regular maintenance program.

Mike Cormaci, candidate, said the long-term goal for campus safety is to install a better lighting system, but currently no funds are available for it.

The short-term answer, he said, would be a security guard force set up to look out for students walking alone at night from campus buildings.

Many of the candidates did not take a stand on the issue of a proposed $12.50-per-semester student athletic fee, but said students — not the student body president — should make the decision whether to approve the fee.

Halinski and Llewelyn said the athletic fee proposal needs more research before a decision can be made, but Howard-Clayton took an opposing stand.

"I'm at a University that's supposed to have a universal view on academics," Howard-Clayton said.

All ten candidates placed the issue of funding for the improvement of Lafene Student Health Center high on their priority list

Aging steam boilers worry University officials

Campus Facilities

By Lisa Pfannenstiel
Collegian Reporter

Editor's note: This the fourth of a five-part series on campus facilities.

Boilers on campus provide the steam power that keeps K-State functioning, but how long the aging boilers can continue providing this service is the question facing University officials today.

For more than 60 years, white smoke and a dull roar from the Physical Plant, north of Seaton Hall, have been the landmark of the K-State boiler system.

Parts of the present system have been in operation in 1929, said Laurence Blake, power plant and utility manager. The oldest generator was disassembled in Seaton Hall, moved to the Physical Plant and reassembled in 1929. The generator is still used.

"The plant is in its later stages of the aging process," said Lawrence Garvin, director of facilities planning.

Vincent Cool, assistant director of facilities planning, said the main concern is how much longer the system will last, since many of its parts have reached the end of their serviceable life.

"The plant is faced with some immediate problems," he said. "Maintaining the existing equipment is tremendously expensive."

Blake said maintenance personnel fix small problems every day, hoping nothing major breaks down on the old machines.

Seven boilers are in the power plant. Five of the six functioning boilers have operated beyond their life expectancy. The remaining boiler — installed in 1929 — was disconnected in 1980.

The life expectancy of a boiler is 15 years, Blake said. Only boiler No. 7, installed in 1973, has not reached its life expectancy.

Blake said two boilers were installed in 1950 and one in 1940. The two boilers purchased in 1966 were overhauled in 1986 for $200,000 each, increasing their life expectancy 10 years.

In March 1987, the newest generator — which usually runs 24 hours a day, 360 days a year — quit, he said. Repairs on boiler No. 7 are in the final stages.

"The generator and turbine were packaged and sent to Texas for an overhaul, costing almost a quarter-of-a-million dollars," Blake said.

"The old 1929 and 1940 generators were used during the repairs. We did the best we could with the worn, less-efficient equipment," he said. "The repaired generator is now functional, but leaks are still being fixed."

Often maintenance workers repair and install equipment to carry the boilers for a limited time, but, as time passes, and the repairs and installations become permanent, Blake said.

Due to lack of room inside the Physical Plant, boiler No. 7 was temporarily installed partially outside the building. The temporary placement has become permanent, Blake said.

He said that wasn't the only example of a temporary situation becoming permanent.

The west wall of the Physical Plant was temporarily installed in 1929. The original plan included expansion by removing the west wall and continuing construction on the adjacent lot, where Durland Hall now stands. After 60 years, the wall of two-by-fours covered with steel panels remains and is still considered a temporary wall.

"We will keep the existing plant in operation for a reasonable period of time. If needed, we will have to add a new boiler," Cool said.

In a 1979 survey, an additional boiler was recommended for installation in 1981, he said. The new boiler has never been purchased but is a planned $1 million investment in the next three or four years.

The additional unit is not needed for actual generating capacity because overall conservation efforts reduced electrical demand. Even with the growth of the University, the current boilers can produce adequate steam for demand, he said.

The plant consists of a cogeneration facility generating about 22 percent of the campus supply. The remaining electrical requirements are purchased from the Kansas Power and Light Co., Cool said.

The cost of supplying the campus with electricity is about $8,000 for an average August day, Blake said.

The cost of maintaining the plant is considered affordable when compared with the cost of a new facility, Cool said.

"We are not going to immediately move the power plant because of the tremendous expense — $25 to $30 million," he said.

Garvin said the only long-range planning was for the site for a replacement plant, north of the newly constructed B-3 parking lot and east of Serum Road. Planning is scheduled to begin in 2009.

When the new power plant is built, a coal-fired plant will also be considered strongly, Cool said.

The Physical Plant runs on steam, using 45 million pounds of steam a month. Eighty percent of the water is recovered, with the remaining 20 percent obtained from the city, Blake said.

"The current plant was originally constructed to also burn coal. A railroad spur came down Bluemont and up to the building," Cool said.

About eight feet of track remains embed-

Races vote in South Africa

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Security forces ringed polling booths Wednesday as South Africans of all races, voting simultaneously for the first time, elected segregated municipal councils nationwide.

President P.W. Botha's National Party faced a fierce challenge from the extreme-right Conservative Party in white communities, many experiencing their first partisan local elections after decades of Nationalist dominance.

The turnout was low in many black townships where anti-apartheid activists urged an election boycott in defiance of state-of-emergency regulations. Police reported scattered arson and stone-throwing attacks but no fatalities or major clashes.

In Soweto, a township near Johannesburg where more than 2 million blacks live, only 4,000 people had voted by midafternoon, the state radio reported. The radio said 20,000 of Soweto's 347,000 registered voters had cast ballots in advance.

Nationwide, 7,229 council seats were at stake in 1,071 communities. The state radio said only 905 of the 1,839 black council seats were being contested.

Anti-apartheid clergymen such as Anglican Archbishop Desmond Tutu, winner of the 1984 Nobel Peace Prize, opposed the elections and urged South Africans to fast and pray during the day.

The government spent millions of dollars on advertising to promote a high turnout, contending that it was broadening democracy even though blacks cannot vote in national elections.

Critics say turnout percentages will have little meaning because millions of blacks were ineligible to vote.

Soviets to launch shuttle

MOSCOW — The Soviet Union said Wednesday it will launch its space shuttle Buran on an unmanned mission this week, following months of delays similar to those that plagued the maiden voyage of its U.S. counterpart.

A government commission set the launch for 6:23 a.m. Moscow time Saturday (11:23 p.m. EDT Friday) after receiving reports from specialists following several thousand tests of the Buran and its booster rocket, the Energia, the official news agency Tass reported.

"Buran" is Russian for snowstorm, an appropriate name since the first snow of the season fell this week in Moscow.

Preparations for pouring nearly 2,000 tons of liquid hydrogen, oxygen and hydrocarbon fuel into Energia, billed as the world's most powerful booster rocket, are to begin today, Tass said. The rocket is capable of carrying more than 100 tons of cargo into Earth orbit, and up to 20 tons to the planets Mars and Venus.

Dissenters jailed, group says

BERLIN — East Germany has imprisoned 1,800 political prisoners in the past 12 months, a West Berlin watchdog group said Wednesday.

The Working Group August 13, which keeps tabs on trends in East Germany, also said that of those imprisoned "600 had been released to resettle in West Germany."

The group is named after the date in 1961 when construction of the Berlin Wall began.

It said "most of those imprisoned were accused of attempting to flee the country, violation of state and social order, or unlawful contacts and forming of mobs."

The report also said that 750,000 East Germans have applied to leave the country for West Germany. So far this year, 20,000 people had been permitted to resettle in the West, it said.

BRIEFLY ACROSS THE NATION

'War of the Worlds' recalled

GROVERS MILL, N.J. — The Martians are coming again, 50 years after Orson Welles scared the daylights out of hundreds of thousands of Americans who believed a War of the Worlds had broken out on Halloween eve.

The hysteria over the radio broadcast clogged telephone lines and roads as the gullible thought huge cylinders carrying Martians were landing throughout the country, wiping out military forces with heat rays and poisonous gas.

Some who sheepishly recounted their terror said they headed for the hills after hearing the fictional newscast. Others said they grabbed their guns and headed for Grovers Mill to fight the invaders. Others just prayed.

Millions heard the broadcast; one survey gave the listenership at 6 million, another at 12 million. Of those who tuned in, according to the surveys, up to 1 million believed it was real, despite disclaimers before and after the program.

Strip blows Robin 'to bits'

NEW YORK — He's punched out the Penguin, wrestled the Riddler and crushed the Catwoman. But after 48 years of crime-busting, Robin — yes, the Boy Wonder, Batman's earnest if excitable teen-age sidekick — has been blown to bits by the Joker.

Death comes next week for Robin when DC Comics distributes Batman issue No. 428, the third installment of the four-part "A Death in the Family," in which the younger half of the Dynamic Duo is dynamited by the clown prince of crime.

"It was very odd. I realize all this stuff is made up, but everybody here felt like the family of an accident victim, waiting for the doctor to come out and say, 'There's still hope,'" said Dennis O'Neil, editor of the Batman series.

The Joker, by the way, is doing more than undermining the quality of life in Gotham City these days; his incendiary eradication of Robin comes under his duties as Iran's new ambassador to the United Nations.

But it won't be the Joker, Batman creator Bob Kane, or O'Neil facing murder charges for the killing of Robin — it's the readers of the Batman comics who voted in a phone-in poll to off the teen superhero born in 1940.

Wichita police chief retires

WICHITA — Richard LaMunyon announced Wednesday he will retire as chief of the Wichita Police Department Nov. 2.

LaMunyon had earlier announced his acceptance of a $75,000 a year job as director of the non-profit organization that is going to operate a pari-mutuel greyhound racetrack just north of Wichita. He makes $62,420 as chief and qualifies for an annual pension of about $39,000.

Pay toilets end at airport

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Pay toilets will soon be a thing of the past at Kansas City International Airport.

Herb Gile, airport terminal manager, said Wednesday that he has ordered the removal by Monday of all pay toilets — about one-fourth of the total toilet stalls at the airport. They cost 10 cents to use.

"With Braniff being a hub operation, people are coming in on one flight and trying to catch a connecting flight," Gile said. "So there's more usage of the restrooms anyway."

Blood drive falling short

The annual KSU Bloodmobile is falling short of its expected donation of 350 units a day. Donation after two days total 593 units.

The American Red Cross Bloodmobile will be in the KSU Rooms in the Union from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m., until Friday.

"We need donors," said Anne Marie Gould, donor resource representative with the Wichita Regional Blood Services. "People don't need need an appointment to give blood. We welcome walk-ins."

Gould said six percent of the population need blood daily, but only four percent donate it.

"We cannot continue to provide hospitals with blood unless there are donations from bloodmobile drives like the one at K-State and throughout the region," she said.

Anderson carillon rings for campus bells

By Audra Dietz
Staff Writer

The sound of bells echo acoss campus every hour from the Anderson Hall tower, but these 'bells' are ringing notes of deceit.

There isn't anyone in the belfry with a mallet ringing Christmas carols or patriotic marches. The bell sounds are created by a carillon, an electronic instrument.

The carillon can play automatically or it can be played manually on two keyboards. A timer connected to the clock at the top of the tower activates the carillon to play "The Chimes of Westminister" on the hour.

Cornell Kinderknecht, graduate student in music performance, plays the carillon for graduation services and on holidays.

"It's fun. Besides that, the money is good," he said. The commencement committee pays him $25 for each of the services at fall and spring graduation. There are four services in December and six in May.

"I have to play the 'Alma Mater' and 'Pomp and Circumstance,' but I get to choose the rest of the music myself," Kinderknecht said.

Playing the carillon can be lonely, he said. Kinderknecht plays the keyboard in solitary confinement in a tiny room on the third floor of Anderson.

The room has no windows and is lighted by a 60-watt bulb in the center of the ceiling.

"It's really odd up here," he said.

The carillon works almost like a player piano, said Bill Wilson, sales administrator for Schulmerich Carillons in Sellersville, Penn. The Schulmerich Corp. made K-State's carillon and maintains it.

Tapes coded with electronic signals are plugged into the carillon and trigger it to play. The carillon reads the codes, and iron rods inside it reproduce the sound of bells.

The top keyboard is called the harp, and the lower one is the flemmish, said Wilson. Each keyboard controls a set of 49 bell-rods, covering four octaves.

Only melodies can be played on the keyboard. This makes the carillon simple enough that most people who can read piano and organ music can play it, Kinderknecht said.

"You do need to practice to know how fast the music can be played," he said.

The music must be played slowly because the carillon has a tremendous echo, he said.

With high humidity and no ventilation in the room, the keys can get stuck and ruin a performance. An air conditioner runs all year to reduce the humidity, but that doesn't always stop the keys from sticking, Kinderknecht said.

"It's a touchy instrument, and a lot of things can go wrong," he said.

Eight speakers in the belfry have 320 watts of amplification. The number of speakers and the power of the amplifier depend on how loud the music must be for those in the projection area to hear it.

"This is a pretty high-powered amplifier, but K-State is a big campus," he said.

The carillon was invented by Jack Kuntz, the Schulmerich company's chief engineer, in the early 1940s.

"Kuntz worked for years to develop the pipes that could create the sound of real cast-iron bells," Wilson said.

Alice and Ralf E. Hockens bought the carillon from Schulmerich and donated it to the University on June 4, 1966 to replace the orignal cast-iron bell. At the time of its dedication, the K-State carillon was the largest in Kansas.

John Klein, a world-renowned carillonneur, presented a recital at the dedication. Klein played 11 songs, including one original composition.

The carillon cost $20,185. A new carillon, with the same speakers and amplifier, would cost more than $40,000 today, Wilson said.

The original Anderson bell, which remains in the belfry, was cast in 1858 and was presented to the University in 1861 by Joseph Engalls.

Other schools with carillons similar to K-State's are the University of Maryland, the University of Nebraska, Oklahoma University, the University of Illinois, Brigham Young University and Texas Christian University.

Staff/Christopher T. Assaf

Playing the Carillon is a lonely job for Cornell Kinderknecht, graduate student in music performance. Located in a tiny room on the third floor of Anderson Hall, he plays live for graduation services and on holidays.

Educator to speak in Union

By The Collegian Staff

Ernest L. Boyer, a recognized leader in education, will participate in K-State's 125th anniversary celebration as the speaker in the Chester E. Peters Lectures in Student Development Series.

Boyer will speak at 3:30 p.m. today in Forum Hall on "The Undergraduate Experience, Present and Future."

Boyer is president of the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, Princeton, N.J. He is also a senior fellow of the Woodrow Wilson School, Princeton University and the education columnist for The London Times.

In 1983 he was selected by his peers as the man of the year in higher education. U.S. News and World Report magazine listed Boyer as one of the top educators in the nation for five consecutive years.

Boyer earned his doctorate at the University of Southern California and was a post-doctoral fellow at the University of Iowa Hospital.

John D. Steffen, associate professor of education and counselor in education and educational psychology, said Boyer will be speaking on the undergraduate general educational curriculum.

Everyone should help make K-State safer

It's late at night and a woman is leaving Farrell Library heading toward her home. It is dark, and the scattered lighting on campus throws shadows back and forth across the walkways. She is alone, and is attacked by an assailant as she passes through a darkened portion of the path. Is it her fault?

Many people would say yes. If the woman was stupid enough to walk alone at night on campus then she deserved to be attacked. She should know better, they would say, there are escort services around, as well as earlier hours in the day to go to the library, or the Union, or a friend's house, or wherever a person may wish to go and find herself traveling alone after dark.

But this is a rather shallow view of the problem that K-State is facing. For too long the blame has been put on the victim of violent crime. Granted, it is often difficult to prosecute a rape, but the questions asked in a trial are often accusatory and reflect poorly on the victim.

Whereas victims of rape are often asked such things as "Were you dressed in a way that might cause sexual thoughts?" or "Have you ever had sex before?" you rarely hear of victims of robberies being asked, "Were you dressed in a nice suit?" or "Have you ever given money away before?"

While common sense is certainly an important part of rape and assault prevention, it is time to quit trying to place all of the responsibility on the victim. Institutions need to start doing their part.

K-State has a unique problem because so many of the activities and the library are on campus. Thus, it is important that the campus be as secure as possible. Unfortunately, it often isn't.

There have been numerous assaults on campus, many of them unreported, that could have been prevented by better lighting or patrolling of the grounds. Some of the worst areas are around Seaton Hall and Farrell Library. These are especially important areas since many students, male and female, study in these areas, often after dark.

Escort services and awareness programs

Commentary

CATHERINE DOUD
Collegian Columnist

can't be counted on to take on the entire burden of campus safety. Often the timing isn't right, or people can't wait to find an escort so they venture forth alone. Sure, it's not the smartest thing to do, but these people have every right to make use of University facilities to further their education, even after dark.

Granted, lighting isn't the only safety concern on campus. Certainly fire standards and handicapped accessibilty are very important issues, but lighting is one issue which can be fairly quickly remedied by the administration if it wishes to do so.

Students who are willing to take action on these sorts of problems should be commended. One student, Becky Thessing, sophomore in architecture, has started a petition to try to get better lighting on campus. She has also sent her proposal to the Hall Governing Board meeting as well as the Panhellenic Council.

Meanwhile, the Illuminating Engineering Society is working on the problem, trying to determine where there is a problem, and the best way to correct it.

A lot of the legwork is already being done for the administration. There is obviously a problem that the students are concerned about. This alone should be waving a red flag to the administration to get something done. It is difficult to try to attract new students, especially female, to the campus, if there is an air that it is an unsafe campus to be on after dark.

Once the engineering society has determined the problem areas, the solution should be a fairly simple one to implement. Certainly it will cost money, probably around $3,000 a fixture. But just think, the money expended will let us see the lovely grass that the University spent over $45,000 in July alone to keep watered.

But what can we do until something is done? Campus police should patrol the campus and the stacks in Farrell Library more diligently. Plus, people should continue to exercise caution while traveling alone at night, as well as attending awareness programs that are often held around campus.

But most of all, students need to get involved. Sign a petition for better lighting. Or better yet, with a new student body presidential election coming up, take the time to see if the candidates really care about campus safety, and what their platforms are based on, or if they are just blowing a lot of hot air and could really care less.

If you can't make the changes in campus safety yourself, why not lend your efforts to a group that can?

Vietnam War memorial should only honor dead

Most students on campus are too young to remember the Vietnam War. To them, the conflict and the conflicts that surrounded it are another slice of history learned from and interpreted by someone else.

Discussion surrounding K-State's Vietnam War Memorial is drawing to a close.

Last week, Student Senate spent two hours in debate about the memorial. Half their time was spent discussing how much to donate, the other half was spent arguing the purpose of the memorial. Should it be an anti-war memorial or should it be dedicated to those K-State students who served and died?

In the end, an overwhelming number of those present felt the memorial was a memorial: nothing more and nothing less. They pledged their support — monetarily and otherwise — to the project.

Whether or not the Vietnam War was waged in the best interests of this or any other nation is not the issue. The issue is that 38 K-State students and alumni losts their lives in a conflict over which they had no control.

If it is true to its cause, and true to the student money which Senate pledged to it, then the inscription should reflect that sentiment.

"In memory of the 38 students and alumni who died during the Vietnam conflict, and in hopes that young lives will never be lost again in the act of waging war; we dedicate this monument to the students, faculty, staff and alumni of Kansas State University."

Nothing more and nothing less.

Elections need you

Editor,

The 1988 election year is about to draw to a close. It culminates with the electing of the president of the United States on Nov. 8. The presidential race has been a sometimes heated and always competitive affair.

Meanwhile, in Manhattan, the K-State campus is gearing up for a general election of its own. At stake on Nov. 1-2 are 53 Student Senate positions, four Board of Student Publications positions, and the office of student body president.

This Student Governing Association election is shaping up to be a precedent-setting one. For starters, the elections committee will have three polling places — in the Union, Derby Food Center and Cardwell Hall. In order to vote, students will need their student fee cards and picture ID's. Already, the record books have been altered with an astounding 12 candidates vying for the position of student body president.

Having a large number of candidates for the position of student body president is exciting and places extra responsibility on the students to become a well-informed voting body. Each student should make an effort to meet the candidates and study issues.

There are numerous ways to go about this. First, the candidates will be visiting different living groups to outline their platforms. In addition, campaign literature will blanket the campus and the Collegian will publish special pages including brief statements from each candidate. Watch all these forums and listen for the following issues: athletic fee, funding of student health services, renovation of Van Zile Hall, Farrell Library, the Educational Opportunity Fund and the divestment of student funds.

Finally, after you've gotten to know a little bit about each candidate, plan to attend the student body presidential candidate debate at 7 p.m. Sunday in the Union Courtyard. The Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas Committee is sponsoring the event, which will begin with a two- to three-minute opening speech from each candidate. The speeches will be followed by the candidates' responses to prepared questions. The debate will close with questions from the audience.

It is the responsibility of individual students to become informed and make an intelligent choice for student body president.

Take advantage of the opportunities available to you. Hope to see you at the polls.

King fork unsexual

Editor,

I am responding to John Skarda's letter to the editor titled "Remove Fork." Skarda alludes to the "pornographic" statue in front of King Hall. I would simply like to remind Skarda that in art, as in almost every other aspect of life, beauty is in the eye of the beholder.

Frankly, I see no "sexual connotations" in the statue. Don't get me wrong. I don't like the statue, but not because it secretly turns me on. I don't like the statue because I think it looks stupid, but, again, that's my personal opinion.

As for alternate suggestions made by Skarda, including a statue of a dairy cow or John Wayne, I really don't see the point. Unless you've been on a cattle round-up recently, these symbols have little motivational effect. Skarda also applauds the Manhattan City Council for choosing a "big, smiling statue of Paul Bunyan" for its park. May I remind Skarda that this statue overlooks a playground designed for toddlers. We're adults now — we can move up to forks.

As for any "Freudian lust" involved in the King statue, once again I must disagree. I don't think Freud ever studied the effects on forks on human sexuality. But I do think he would be terribly interested in someone excited by bigger-than-life statues of cowboys, lumberjacks, farm animals and kitchen utensils.

Kaw just like fork

Editor,

Every other year or so, someone picks up some new ways to use symbolism and instantly interprets "The Fork," near King Hall, as a phallic symbol. John Skarda not only saw it as obscene but also suggested we replace it with a symbol students could look up to — like John Wayne or Paul Bunyan. Skarda further suggests we all take note of the "Paul Bunyan" statue in City Park. Little does Skarda know that the statue in the park is Johnny Kaw, harvester, not Paul Bunyan, lumberjack. Who needs a lumberjack in Kansas? Skarda has yet to notice what was pointed out to me, as a freshman, about Mr. Kaw. Approached from the rear at an angle, Mr. Kaw seems to be handling something rather obscene (instead of his scythe, which is also a phallic symbol), which is why many people I know refer to him as "Mr. Erection."

Perhaps Skarda needs to re-evaluate what kinds of art are or are not sexually-oriented. Even a statue of John Wayne could promote machoism or studliness — hence male sexuality.

Keep free expression

Editor,

John Skarda, are you stoned? Oh, we had better not mention "stoned," considering your fetish for concrete.

We agree that "The Fork" can be interpreted in any manner the viewer wishes, but we seriously doubt that many other people share your interpretation of this work of art. We don't recall speaking with anyone whose mind was filled with "sexual connotations and hidden Freudian lust" at their first sight of "The Fork."

If we must remove "The Fork" due to its sexual innuendos, then must we also remove the Washington Monument and the Leaning Tower of Pisa?

We find the possibility that you may someday hold an influential position from which you can wage your war on freedom of expression to be disconcerting.

After eating supper, how can you respect yourself in the morning?

Local council devoted to promoting fine arts

By Diane Zumult
Collegian Reporter

Since its founding in 1972, the Manhattan Arts Council has been promoting, encouraging and increasing the appreciation and practice of the arts in the Manhattan area.

"The Council is a non-profit, service organization devoted to facilitating the practice of the arts on a local and area level," said John Biggs, director of the Manhattan Arts Council.

Projects sponsored by the MAC have been as diverse as the Flinthills Festival, Manhattan Public Sculpture Competition and Summer Repertory Theater Productions.

Working in conjunction with K-State, MAC sponsored "The KSU Permanent Art Collection" exhibit at the Union National Bank in September.

MAC has also sponsored performers such as jazz artist Gunther Schuller.

The MAC also coordinates arts and music appreciation programs and instruction in the Manhattan public schools and surrounding areas.

"The Arts Council is funded by a combination of sources, including private- and corporate-membership donations, state and federal grants, and funds from the City of Manhattan," Biggs said.

The MAC is governed by a board of directors and advisers. In addition to Biggs, who has been director for three years, MAC's office is staffed by administrative assistant director Dale Clore and editorial intern Jackie Ayscue.

Volunteers help at various functions sponsored by the MAC, such as the opening of Manhattan Town Center.

In September, MAC published its first issue of the City Arts Magazine, a monthly publication listing the arts in the Manhattan area.

"There seems to be some confusion in the public mind as to what constitutes the arts," Biggs said. "In the City Arts Magazine, we plan to clarify and bring together comprehensive news of all the Manhattan arts in one publication."

Manhattan is far superior to 95 percent of Kansas communities in the amount of artistic resources available, Biggs said.

Whales reach open seas

U.S. and U.S.S.R. cooperate in rescue

By The Associated Press

BARROW, Alaska — Two whales trapped for nearly three weeks in the arctic ice pack were freed Wednesday by Soviet and American icebreakers, superpower saviors who hacked a path to the open sea.

"The whales are loose and in the channel and headed out," said Lt. Mike Haller, a spokesman for the Alaska National Guard. "They looked good all afternoon. To look at them, you'd have thought they had their bags packed and were ready to head south."

"They're in the main lead, and I can't help but think they'll keep on truckin'. I don't know how much more we can do," said rescue coordinator Ron Morris of the U.S. National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration.

The work to free the migrating California gray whales progressed rapidly Tuesday when two Soviet ice-breaking vessels began smashing the ice that kept the pair imprisoned. A third trapped whale is believed to have died last week.

Morris, who followed the whales by helicopter, landed a little after 4 p.m. (9 p.m. EDT) to report that the whales had moved from the final man-made breathing hole to the slushy path the Soviet icebreaker Vladimir Arseniev cut Tuesday night.

Rescue officials were worried that the whales would have trouble breaking air holes through the partly frozen cut, but around 4:30 p.m. rescue workers found the two whales had opened a small breathing hole and were sharing it.

One of the whales was bleeding enough to stain the water red.

Spectators watched anxiously for several moments, waiting for the whales to surface in the new waterway cut Wednesday by the Arseniev — and cheered joyously when the whales broke the surface.

As darkness fell, the whales were swimming back and forth in the channel. Officials planned to discontinue the helicopter surveillance at nightfall.

Scientists and others involved in the rescue may never know the whales' fate. Rescue officials decided not to put electronic tracking tags on the already stressed animals.

"The whales are loose and in the channel and headed out. They looked good all afternoon. To look at them, you'd have thought they had their bags packed and were ready to head south."

—Lt. Mike Haller Alaska National Guard

"A lot of people really didn't want to know," said Jim Harvey, a federal marine biologist.

Haller said plans were being made in Barrow to thank the Soviets with a party, possibly Wednesday night.

Before the whales were freed, as the Soviet icebreakers drew near, the whales were "acting in a very excited manner, almost like they can sense freedom," said Sgt. Ian Robertson, an Alaska National Guard spokesman.

By midday, the Soviet icebreakers were a quarter-mile from the line of breathing holes being cut by Americans working in the opposite direction, he said.

Later Wednesday, rescuers began to use a gargantuan, tractor-like device propelled by pontoon augers to clear the ice cut by the icebreaker, Robertson said.

The breakthrough in the effort to free the migrating gray whales caught in an early freeze came after more than a week of delays and disappointments.

"We feel very good about it," said Rear Adm. Sigmund Petersen of NOAA. "The cooperation has just been fantastic. The Soviets came in here with a very positive attitude and went to work immediately."

Student Body President

JD Llewelyn

Dear Voters of Kansas State University,

The Collegian is telling us that the mud slinging has begun and that it has no place on K-State's campus is much like the pot calling the kettle black. Let us just state in reference to the Collegian editorial of Oct. 26 entitled "K-State Campaigns" that I am not, and will NOT be a Pat Muir. To use a national slogan — I am no Pat Muir.

I refuse to be the victim of an untrue and vicious smear campaign led by the K-State Collegian or some unknown force. I do not believe that a newspaper should have so much power that they can destroy a candidate in a few days. A campaign that I've worked on hard for several weeks.

For those of you who don't remember Pat Muir, let me tell about him. Pat was the leading presidential candidate last year until a few well-timed and well-placed Collegian campaign articles, some called them political smear, appeared and he finished fourth in the balloting.

The Collegian accomplished what they had set out to do. They ruined a qualified candidate.

K-State has some serious problems that need to be addressed. We have lighting problems, buildings that are not up to the fire code and a Student Senate with 24 members who dropped their own impeachment proceedings, because they decided not to enforce their own rules.

We have problems at K-State. No denying it. I want to be part of the solution.

So I will NOT drop from this race, nor will I succomb to the pressure of the Collegian. I still stand behind my commitment to serve the interest of all K-State students.

The remark made at the Alpha Chi house was the "J D has never been kicked out of any place that he has lived." This comment made by the manager had nothing to do with Phil Nordhus. It only answered a rumor that I had been excommunicated from my fraternity, Farmhouse. This is not true. I am an out-of-house active in good standing.

I suggest that Mr. Schrag and the editorial board find out all the facts before printing such malicious untruths—just like the big boys in Washington.

Nurses' Day offers professional interaction

8 schools attracted to Union to explain nursing programs

By Theresa Luling
Collegian Reporter

For those interested in the nursing profession or those are already in it, K-State is conducting "Nurses Day" today in the Union.

Representatives from eight Kansas colleges and universities which grant bachelor's degrees in nursing will be on campus from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. in Union 212.

"This is an opportunity for pre-nursing students, registered nurses, and licensed practical nurses to find out more about nursing and the future outlook of the field," said Phoebe Samelson, instructor of arts and sciences.

"I'm finding that there are a lot of people in the University community and the surrounding areas who are considering going into the nursing profession," she said.

Until recently, there had been a decline in the nursing field, she said. A noticeable drop occurred in the United States in 1983 and 1984.

"Although the numbers are going back up, there is an acute and chronic nursing shortage," Samelson said. "Because of this, there has been major recruitment for nurses all over the United States."

K-State is no exception. Representatives from across Kansas have been visiting the campus for years to discuss their nursing programs and to answer students' questions, she said.

"This is an opportunity for pre-nursing students, registered nurses, and licensed practical nurses to find out more about nursing and the future outlook of the field."
—Phoebe Samelson instructor

"It is a lot easier and more fun to get everyone in at once," she said.

The nursing departments represented are: St. Mary of the Plains College; Marymount College; The Wichita State University; Washburn University; the University of Kansas; Fort Hays State University; Pittsburg State University and Bethel College.

A panel consisting of representatives from the schools will address any questions or concerns students have about the nursing field.

Samelson said the panel would address such questions as why a person would enter nursing, the future of nursing, and the salaries nurses can expect.

"This day will give the students a chance to take a look at the nursing programs the schools offer," said Raylene Hodge, junior in pre-nursing. "Some schools might offer scholarships while others provide hands-on training. It just depends on what the student is looking for, as far as what school they will transfer to."

Hodge said her father found an article in News Today which stated nursing is paying higher salaries than in the past. The article said that, in the next four to five years, the demand for nurses is expected to climb.

"It's nice to know salaries are increasing," she said. "My class will definitely benefit from it."

If time permits, each representative may give a short presentation explaining their school's nursing program and what it offers.

Samelson welcomes all interested faculty and students to attend the seminar.

KU degree available here

By Theresa Luling
Collegian Reporter

The University of Kansas is extending its Bachelor of Science degree in nursing compeletion program for registered nurses to Manhattan and surrounding areas.

Nurses will no longer have to travel to Salina or Topeka, which are the closest BSN programs, to complete their degrees now that the program is offered through K-State.

"What we are seeing is the cooperation of two state institutions," said Phoebe Samelson, arts and sciences instructor.

"There has been a need for this type of nursing program for a long time," she said. "And the job market in the future will require individuals to have a BSN.

"It is the preferred route for any student because it offers nursing in greater depth," she said.

The nursing program was initiated last summer and with it came a lot of confusion, she said.

"Many individuals were under the assumption that K-State now had a nursing program available," she said.

In a sense, K-State did and does have a nursing program, but it is only for those in pre-nursing or those who are already RN's wanting to get their BSN, Samelson said.

The pre-nursing student will take liberal arts courses for two years and then transfer to another university or college to receive their BSN, she said. "K-State does not offer a nursing degree," she said.

The RN who wants to move up in the field of nursing can get their BSN through KU courses offered at K-State, she said. Historically, there are three routes to an RN license:

- Attend a junior college and receive an associate degree in nursing with the eligibility to become an RN.
- Attend a four-year college and receive a BSN.
- Attend a three-year hospital diploma program with the eligibility to become an RN.

"This program is currently being phased out in Kansas and nationally," Samelson said.

"The nursing program offered by KU through K-State is not a full-time program," Samelson said. "It is presumed that once you become an RN, you are working.

"It really is a wonderful program, especially for those people who have families and want to continue their education," said Joyce Kuykendall, senior in information systems.

"We only have class for four or five hours every other week," she said. KU sends faculty from Lawrence to instruct one or two courses a semester at K-State, she said.

"With my responsibilities at home and at work, I wouldn't have attempted a BSN if the program had been offered someplace else.

This program is necessary, Samelson said, because of the great need for nurses.

"With it being the largest of all the health professions, if you don't like one area of nursing there is always something else," Samelson said.

Nurses are going in all directions, she said. They are setting up their own corporations, working in hospitals, and a lot are going on to graduate school.

Through the introduction of the nursing program, Samelson said, "we are seeing the cooperation of two state institutions helping individuals go further in the nursing profession."

'Cats crush visiting Jayhawks

By Russ Ewy
Sports Writer

What has been a close contest in years past took just over an hour and a half to complete as K-State's volleyball team stormed past the University of Kansas Jayhawks in just three games Wednesday in Ahearn Field House.

Even though the Wildcats won 15-4, 15-10, 15-9, K-State coach Scott Nelson said it was a close match.

"It seemed like each game was real close," Nelson said. "As each game went on, we stayed fairly consistent and it seemed that Kansas was just plagued with some unforced errors. It seemed that they have some ball handling errors, but as a rule, their errors came from bad spikes or some bad serves."

The 'Cats dominated their intrastate rivals with an attack average of .314 to KU's .105. K-State also outblocked the Jayhawks 13-1.

"With Kansas as a slightly shorter blocking team, we should be using that to our advantage, and I believe we did from the midpoint of each game on," Nelson said. "We're the ones that seemed to control the tempo at the net with our block and our hitting. I don't think we scored too many times with soft shots, I think we scored most of our points and side-outs with harder attacks."

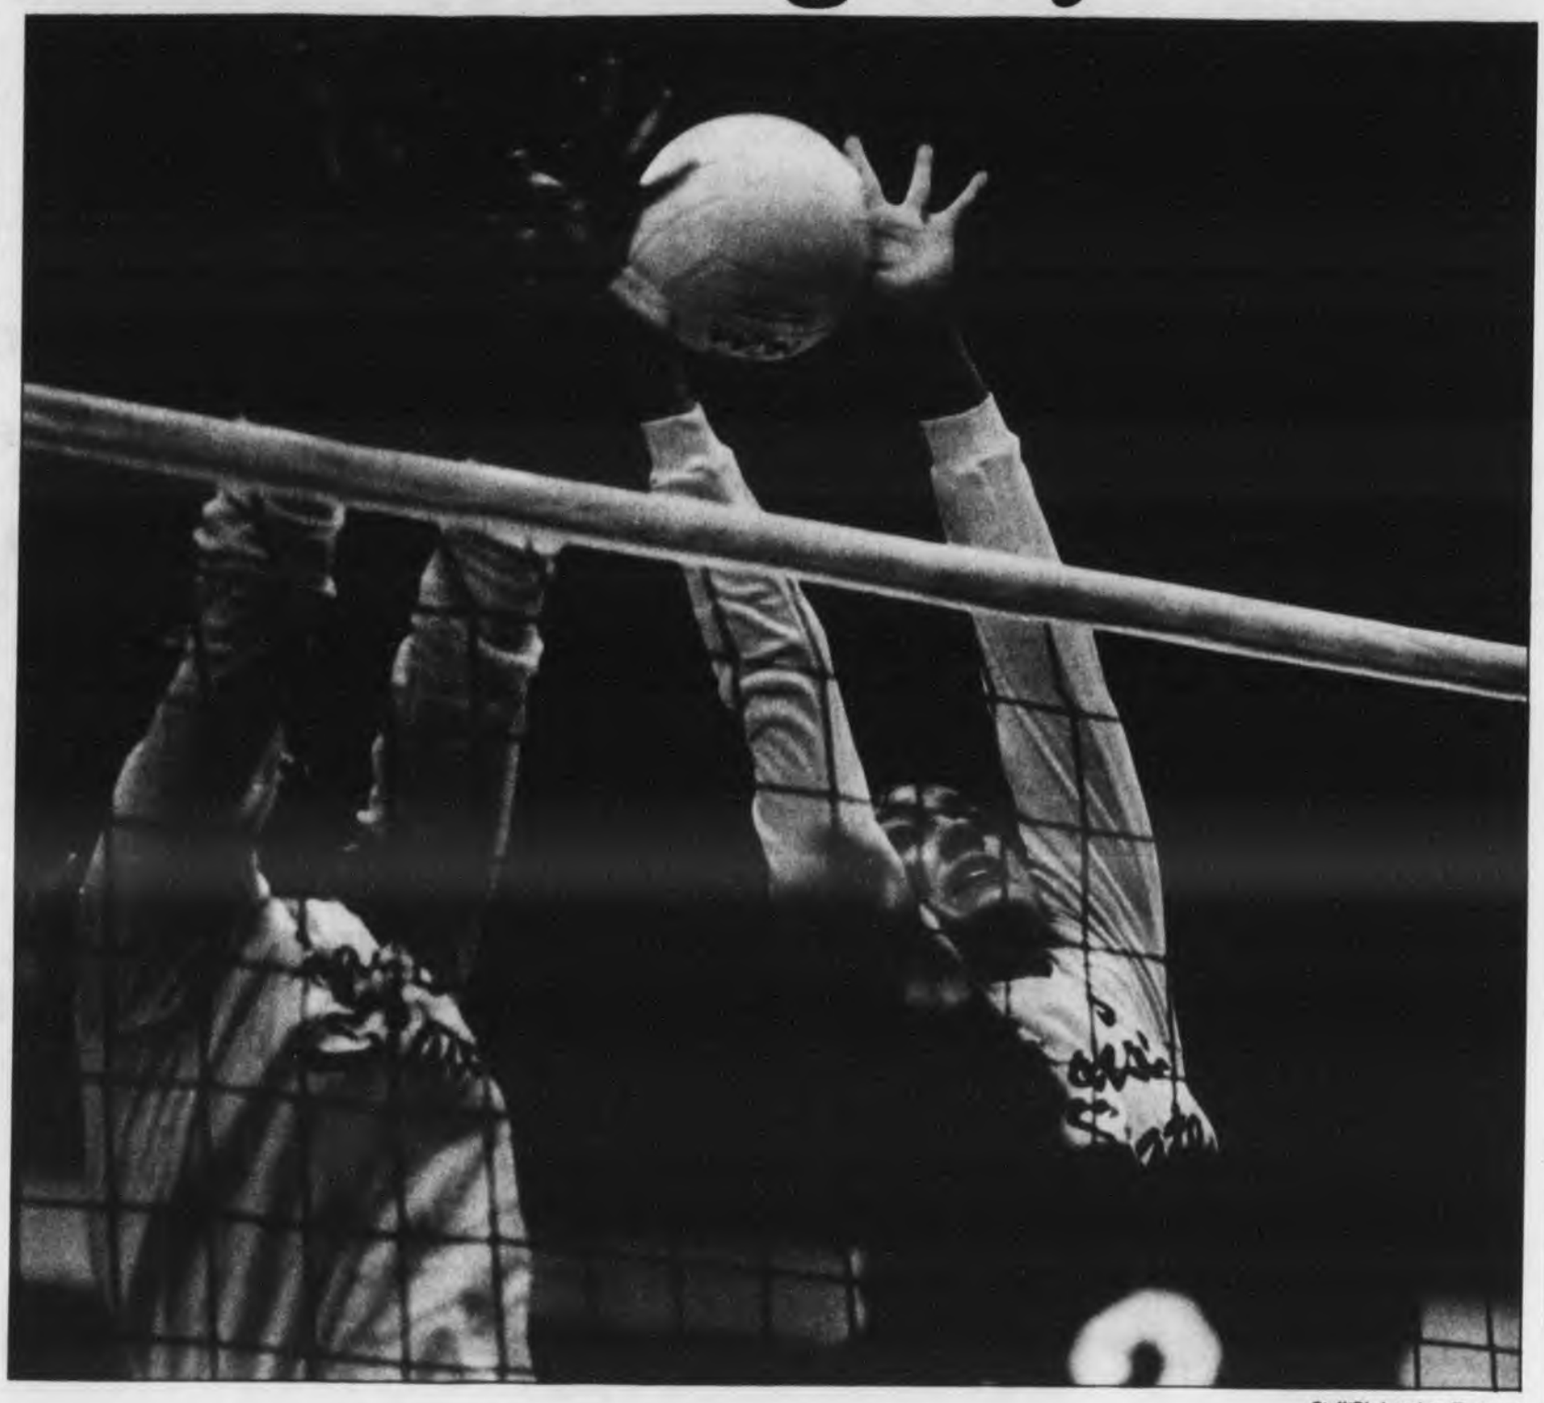
Consistant performance is the norm for Shawnee Call and last night was no exception. The All-Big Eight Conference senior tallied 14 kills and 16 digs to lead both teams.

"I thought (Shawnee's) defense was good," Nelson said. "I don't know how many times we swung for points because of an incredible dig by Shawnee. You have to play good defense, either blocking or back row, to score points because (Kansas) is going to continuously hit different shots.

"So, it wasn't just her offense, I think that her defense allowed us to swing at points against a team that plays a style like Kansas."

In the middle of the third game, K-State's Mary Mignano served four straight points to break out of a lull and put the match out of reach for the 'Hawks.

"We seemed to be struggling right around 10 points in the third game and that's why (Mary) Mignano came in," Nelson said. "She got us the win, even though she didn't serve us the 15th point."



This conference win places the 'Cats close behind Iowa State for fourth in the Big Eight race. Colorado is third, Nebraska is second and Oklahoma is on top.

"As far as the conference goes, I think that we're right in the hunt. We are in control of our own destiny, as long as we keep on winning the games and the matches," Nelson said.

"If we lose one or two matches from this point on, we lose control of our own destiny and we are going to have to rely on other teams, Iowa State or Missouri or Kansas, to upset other teams," he added.

K-State can improve its position in the Big Eight standings, and its postseason tournament hopes, by defeating Colorado next week in Boulder. Colorado defeated the 'Cats in three games earlier this season.

"We feel like (the Colorado match) has been one of our worst efforts this year and we know exactly what Colorado will do," Nelson said.

Wildcats Shawnee Call and Valerie Kastens attempt to block a spike by a University of Kansas player in the second game of Wednesday night's volleyball match in Ahearn Field House. The 'Cats crushed the Jayhawks in three games, winning 15-4, 15-10, 15-9.

Lasorda garners NL honor

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Tommy Lasorda, who led Los Angeles to the World Series championship and their sixth National League West title in 12 years, was named NL Manager of the Year Wednesday by the Baseball Writers Association of America.

Lasorda received 101 points in balloting by a committee of two writers from each NL city. He had 19 first-place votes and was named on 23 of 24 ballots. It was the second time Lasorda was voted manager of the year. He won the award in 1983, its initial year.

Jim Leyland of Pittsburgh was second with 50 points after leading the Pirates to an 85-75 record and second place in the East behind the New York Mets.

Davey Johnson, who led the Mets to a league-leading 100-60 record and their second East title in three years, was third with 38 points.

Jack McKeon, who took over the Padres from Larry Bowa on May 28, was fourth with 27 points. San Diego was 67-48 under McKeon and had the second-best record in the league over the final four months of the season.

Lasorda learned that he had won while flying to Los Angeles after the Dodgers had been honored Wednesday at the White House.

"This completes my day — one of the greatest days of my life," the Dodger manager told Jack Lang, secretary-treasurer of the writers' group, in a telephone conversation from the plane.

"Any success that a manager gets can only come through the contributions of the players because they're the ones that do the job," Lasorda said at the White House.

The Dodgers, who won the West by seven games, were 94-67 this year after finishing 73-89 in 1986 and 1987.

Los Angeles is 1,022-874 in Lasorda's 12 years as manager. He is third among active managers in victories behind Sparky Anderson of Detroit and Whitey Herzog of St. Louis and is 38th on the all-time list.

Despite dismal performance, Chiefs will stay in KC

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Despite unhappy fans and dwindling attendance, the Kansas City Chiefs have no intention of looking for a new home, the president of the troubled NFL team said Wednesday.

At the same time, Jack Steadman admitted public confidence in the franchise has plunged to an all-time low.

"I don't think there's any question about that, and that's as it should be," Steadman said. "We have not produced. We're in a people business and we've got to make sure we've got the right people in the right places at all levels. If we do not, then ultimately I am at fault. And I accept that responsibility."

A 7-6 loss at home Sunday to the weak Detroit Lions left the Chiefs with a 1-6-1 record and a mark of 5-17-1 since firing the only coach to get them to the playoffs since 1971. Attendance in the second half of the season is likely to be dismal, and many fans have begun to wonder if their team really wants to win.

The lease at 78,000-seat Arrowhead Stadium expires after the 1996 season and Kansas Citians are keenly aware their sister city across the state lost its NFL team when the Cardinals fled to Phoenix.

An editorial Monday in the Kansas City Times — headlined "Sadsack Football" — brought this deep distrust into the open.

"Are the Kansas City Chiefs deliberately trying to lose so they'll stop attracting crowds to Arrowhead and be able to move more easily to another city in 1997?" the editorial said. "Surely not. But what else explains such an extended run of incompetence?"

"To imply that this organization has somehow determined that it is in our best interests to lose football games is assinine," said Steadman, who helped owner Lamar Hunt move the franchise from Dallas in 1963 and has been the organization's top man since 1974.

"We have problems," Steadman said. "And we are dealing with them, and we will continue to deal with them. But that has absolutely nothing to do with our commitment to Kansas City."

Steadman called the Chiefs' consistent lack of success "an embarrassment to everybody in this organization.

"And it's an embarrassment to our fans," he added. "We have problems, and we have to solve those problems, and we will solve those problems. But we are not going to panic and make panic moves in the middle of the season. We are working hard to make this program successful.

"Now, it's very easy to wake up on Monday morning after a game and say, 'Fix it.' But it's more difficult and more long-term than that because it comes down to people."

While vehemently denying the Chiefs have any intention of leaving town, Steadman nevertheless said they will seek a new, less demanding lease agreement with the Jackson County Sports Authority when their lease expires in 1997.

"We have a difficult lease, but I am confident that at renewal time the Kansas City leadership will do what's fair in regard to our lease," he said. "It's a very difficult lease in that we operate the facility, and it's very expensive to operate. Combine our rental costs and just the operating and maintenance costs of the facility on a 365-day basis, and that total cost as a percentage of revenues runs in excess of 21 percent of our gate receipts net of taxes.

"Most teams in the NFL are in the 6-8 percent range. We have to compete with those teams financially."

Penn State placed in spoiler role

By The Associated Press

STATE COLLEGE, Pa. — With victories over traditional rival West Virginia in 28 of the last 29 years, Penn State is not accustomed to playing the spoiler against the Mountaineers.

But Penn State Coach Joe Paterno says his Nittany Lions are at least two-touchdown underdogs against unbeaten and seventh-ranked West Virginia for Saturday's game.

"This year, West Virginia has much better personnel. We have potentially good personnel, but we're a year or two away at least. They're there. They're there right now," Paterno said.

Penn State, 4-3, plays West Virginia, 7-0, in Morgantown, W.Va.

"I think it's probably the best offensive team we've ever played against," said Paterno, in his 23rd year as Penn State's head coach. "I can't believe there are six teams in the country better than they are."

Paterno, at his weekly news conference Tuesday, compared West Virginia's offense to Miami in 1986 with Vinny Testaverde at quarterback, but said quarterback Major Harris' running ability made the Mountaineers more explosive.

Penn State defeated that Miami team 14-10 to win the Fiesta Bowl and the national championship, but Paterno was downplaying the Lions' chances against West Virginia.

"It's going to be tough. We're going to go in there and hopefully they'll drop a few passes," he said.

Asked about the point spread in Saturday's game, Paterno said, "I'm surprised it's only 13½. I would have thought it would have been more. That's being very generous to us."

West Virginia has averaged 43 points a game and scored more than 50 points three times.

Harris, a second-year quarterback, has completed 59 of 97 passes for 1,095 yards and seven touchdowns. He has also run the ball 72 times for 371 yards and five touchdowns.

West Virginia's last victory over Penn State came in 1984, when the Mountaineers won 17-14 at home. Before that, the Nittany Lions had won 25 consecutive games.

Penn State defeated West Virginia 25-21 last year and holds a 44-8-2 advantage in the series.

West Virginia's last five victories in the series were by a total of 24 points, including a 21-7 "romp" in 1955.

The Mountaineers are coming off a 59-19 blitz of Boston College. Penn State has dropped two in a row, scoring only one touchdown while losing to Syracuse 24-10 and Alabama (8-3).

Despite its lack of success in the series, West Virginia is a 13-point favorite. Halloween Upset Special: Penn State 24-21.

If you like spine-tingling games that aren't decided until the last minute — former New York Mets manager Wes Westrum called them "cliff-dwellers" — this may not be your week.

You have to go all the way down to ninth-ranked Auburn to find a Top Twenty team that is favored by less than two touchdowns. Clemson and South Carolina are the only other teams in the Associated Press rankings that are single-digit favorites.

The main reason, of course, is that there isn't a single game between Top Twenty teams this weekend. But watch out for those Halloween hobgoblins.

Washington State at No. 1 UCLA (favored by 21): UCLA 49-21.

No. 2 Notre Dame (by 34) at Navy: Notre Dame 49-7.

No. 3 Southern California (by 16) at Oregon State: Southern Cal 35-21.

No. 4 Miami, Fla. (by 31) at East Carolina: Miami 56-14.

Missouri at No. 5 Nebraska (by 37): Nebraska 42-14.

Kansas at No. 8 Oklahoma by 50): Oklahoma 45-7.

No. 9 Auburn (by 7) at Florida: Auburn 17-7.

No. 10 Wyoming (by 17) at Colorado State: Wyoming 31-21.

Rice at No. 11 Arkansas (by 22): Arkansas 38-10.

No. 12 Oklahoma State (by 38) at K-State: Oklahoma State 45-14.

Mississippi at No. 13 LSU (by 11): LSU 34-17.

No. 14 Michigan (by 29) at Northwestern: Michigan 49-6.

No. 15 Clemson (by 8) at Wake Forest: Clemson 24-14.

No. 17 South Carolina (by 3) at North Carolina State: South Carolina 24-17.

William & Mary at No. 18 Georgia (no line): Georgia 52-0.

No. 19 Alabama (by 12) at Mississippi State: Second Upset Special: Mississippi State 17-14.

Arizona State at No. 20 Oregon (by 12): Oregon 31-17.

Louisville (by 10½) at Cincinnati: Third Upset Special: Cincinnati 28-27.

Purdue (by 7½) at Wisconsin: Fourth Upset Special: Wisconsin 24-21.

Sports Briefly

White squad stays alive

The white team avoided a sweep with a 10-9 come-from-behind win Tuesday in the K-State baseball team's World Series, playing this week at Frank Myers Field. The purple team leads the best-of-five game series, 2-1.

Shuttle offered to Bramlage

K-State basketball fans will have the oppoprtunity to ride to Fred Bramlage Coliseum from the Union for Wildcat and Lady Cat home games this semester via the K-State Union Express.

The shuttle service will begin two hours before the games and will run in 15-minute intervals. The shuttle will continue to run after the game until the last passenger has returned to the Union. Tickets will be available from the cashiers at the Union.

Former Chief convicted

OVERLAND PARK — Sherman Cocroft, a former defensive back for the Kansas City Chiefs, was convicted in Municipal Court Tuesday for misdemeanor battery and fined $50. Cocroft, who now plays for the Buffalo Bills, has 10 days to appeal the verdict to Johnson County District Court.

Prosecutor Mike Santos said the hearing lasted nearly five hours and featured testimony from several Chiefs players. The complaint contended that Cocroft assaulted David C. Mauer during an argument outside a private club last summer. Joe Dioszeghy, the player's lawyer, said Cocroft acted in self defense. Dioszeghy said Wednesday the verdict will be appealed.

because of the importance of inexpensive health-care facilities on campus for students to utilize.

King, Llewelyn, Cuffy and Howard-Clayton said they may possibly support a slight student-health fee increase if all other resources are ruled out.

Jones, King, McIntyre said the Legislature should ensure Lafene is funded adequately.

On the issue of funding the library, Kirk said Farrell is not the worst library in the Big Eight, but it is the smallest and has the lowest budget.

He said improvements in Farrell should first be funded by the University and alumni donations. Funding from student fees should be the last resort.

Other candidates' views mainly focused on state funding for improvements in Farrell.

"Student fees is not even an option," Howard-Clayton said.

Most candidate platforms dealt with communication among students, the administration and student government. Other popular planks in platforms included funding priorities, student involvement and awareness about campus issues.

Howard-Clayton is the candidate for the Students for Educational Awareness party. Her main focus is to change the electoral process of student senators. Now students vote by college. She would like students to vote by political party to ensure fair representation for all students, she said.

Candidates participating in the debate were Mike Cormaci, senior in agricultural economic; Laurian Cuffy, senior in management; Brenda Halinski, senior in elementary education; Sally Howard-Clayton, senior in humanities; Tom Jones, sophomore in political science; Scott King, junior in political science; Phil Kirk, senior agriculture economics; J.D. Llewelyn, pre-professional business administration; John McIntyre, senior in industrial engineering; and Phil Nordhus, senior in economics.

Candidates not present were Bob Copple, graduate in industrial engineering and Jason Miles, junior in political science.

ded in the cement in one portion of the building.

"There is also a huge steel hopper in the upper portion of the water plant that could have contained coal," he said. "There was an ash dump beside the chimney, and some of the underground machinery is still there.

"But there was never a lump of coal in the building because natural gas became popular at the same time," Cool said.

The University burned coal in Seaton Hall during its first 50 years, Blake said. Most of the boilers were coal-fired.

Friday: There are plans to renovate several buildings on campus.

A way to protect the tree from disease would be to inject a chemical in its roots to kill beetles or fungus, but this is the most risky treatment for Dutch elm disease, he said.

The lack of other trees in the area may be an asset to the Louis Vieux's health, Naughton said. Because the beetles are transported from tree to tree by wind, the tree's chances of getting Dutch elm disease are low.

DUCK DROUGHT

Hunters shoot at new regulations and fewer birds

Todd Turner, (center) and Gary Etheridge (right), junior in park and resources management, along with Stan Skwarlo, use duck calls to bring down the ducks as they and Sean Mills wait in the duck blind.

The drought of 1988 has resulted in a shorter season for Kansas duck hunters, who also face a myriad of regulations designed to improve future duck populations.

Kansas hunters will be limited to 39 hunting days, down from 51 in previous years. The season began Oct. 22. Hunters are allowed to take three ducks each day, no more than two mallards and one hen mallard. Shooting hours start at sunrise, 30 minutes later than the starting time last year.

According to the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, the summer drought has made an emergency condition for the present and future abundance of the waterfowl population in the United States. The lack of water on breeding grounds has resulted in a nationwide population decrease among waterfowl that migrate to the United States from Canada.

"These rules needed to be set. The waterfowl numbers are down, and we must do something to keep the situation under control," said Don Haley, wildlife biologist for U.S. Fish and Wildlife Services.

Haley said limiting the number of birds hunted is not the only way to rejuvenate the population. Maintaining a good wet-land habitat is "essential."

"It is prudent to reduce the harvest of ducks, since ducks are at such a low level, but I don't think I would go as far to close the season completely," said Spencer Tomb, associate professor of biology and vice president of the Kansas Wildlife Federation.

Spencer said habitat loss is responsible for the reduction of the duck population, not excessive hunting.

"The hunter does not want to be involved in the loss of duck population. We want it to stay at a huntable level," Spencer said.

One reason waterfowl populations have declined is precipitation has been below normal in the past 10 years, he said.

"We have lost wet-land habitat — 400,000 acres a year. That loss of nesting habitat has caused the ducks to decrease in numbers," Spencer said.

Chuck Bever, biologist with Kansas Wildlife and Parks, said the last decade has been extremely dry.

"The 80s has been a dry period in the North Plain which has caused a negative reaction to the duck population," Bever said. The North Plain includes area between Kansas and the southern part of Minnesota.

Bever said the habitat has been altered also in the Great Plains, which includes states between New Mexico and Minnesota.

"Drying up pot-holes and wetlands' changing to agriculture has hurt the waterfowl population," Bever said.

Not everyone agrees with all of the new hunting regulations. Some think the regulations should be even stricter. Spencer said he was disappointed with the rule regarding the shooting of hen mallards.

"I think there should be a lot more protection of the hen mallards," Spencer said.

Spencer also said the average duck hunter will be hurt by not being allowed to shoot before sunrise.

"The ducks are very active before sunrise, (so) limiting it to sunrise will cut down the number of birds shot a day," Haley said.

Last year, 74 million ducks were flying south. This year, only 66 million are flying south, Haley said.

"Overall, there is an 18 percent decrease of waterfowl moving south. A hunter may have seen 1,000 ducks last year, but this year (will) see only 820. The average hunter won't be able to see a big difference," Haley said.

On the local level, the new regulations will be noticed, said Don Morton, owner of Don Morton Sports.

"Any time something happens to the duck season it will cut down the hunters and affect us. The more limitations, the less hunters you will see," Morton said.

Some K-State students who hunted during the weekend said the new regulations adversely affected their hunting, but they still approved of them.

"The change in the regulation in regards to shooting hours obviously affected the amount of time it took us to get our limit of ducks. We had ducks working on our decoys a half hour before sunrise, which would have enabled us to get our ducks much earlier," said Stan Skwarlo, senior in marketing.

He said the regulations were necessary to protect future waterfowl populations.

"I agree with the Fish and Wildlife Service on their decision to shorten

Stan Skwarlo and Todd Turner discuss the morning hunt shortly before sunrise. The hunt begins at sunrise, with each hunter allowed a three-bird limit.

Todd Turner brings in a couple kills from the water during Tuesday morning's hunt. The group brought down 10 birds, just short of the limit.

Todd Turner reels in a decoy after everyone decided to quit. The hunting was slow after the first nine birds, wearing patience thin and creating a lot of false reports of ducks.

Stephan's suit continues, could reach $15 million

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Topeka attorney Margie Phelps ended two days of testimony Wednesday after lawyers introduced as evidence more than 80 newspaper stories and editorials about the 1985 settlement of a sexual harassment suit against Attorney General Robert T. Stephan.

The suit, brought by Marcia Tomson, a former employee in the attorney general's office, is the basis of the current multi-million dollar breach-of-contract suit filed against Stephan after he revealed terms of the settlement at a news conference on October, 29, 1985, three years ago this week.

Tomson is seeking $5.2 million in damages in U.S. District Court. Under federal regulations, however, that figure could be tripled for punitive damages.

Tomson also alleges that Stephan and former state Sen. Bob W. Storey, a co-defendant, held her up in a "false light" before the public by their statements made at the 1985 news conference.

Phelps, of Phelps Chartered law firm, represented Tomson in the two suits and helped arrange the settlement in the first one. She was disqualified from representing Tomson in the second suit because of her role as a witness.

In her testimony Wednesday, Phelps denied she has been conducting a vendetta against Stephan, a suggestion made by Stephan's attorney, Gerald Michaud of Wichita.

Under cross examination, Phelps said her family has helped Stephan in the past.

"I wasn't on a vendetta," Phelps testified. "I didn't know him, I didn't dislike him."

She confirmed her firm has sued the attorney general six times, but said those suits were against Stephan in his official capacity as attorney general and were not directed at him personally.

Deanne Watts Hay of Topeka, representing Storey, introduced scores of articles and editorials from state newspapers showing that Stephan was embroiled in controversy and under public pressure to reveal the terms of the settlement months before the news conference. Stephan was planning to seek the Republican nomination for governor in 1986.

Storey, a former state senator and political supporter of Stephan, was not involved in the case until the news conference, Miss Phelps said. He is being sued for placing Tomson in a false light, but an allegation against him of interfering with a contract was dropped before the trial started Monday.

The headlines of some of the articles introduced as evidence, drawn from papers across the state, read: "Stephan's Silence Draws Political Heat," "Heat on Attorney General," and "Seek New Candidate."

Hay also introduced evidence that Gov. Mike Hayden, who was then speaker of the Kansas House, wanted to sponsor legislation that would pro-

11 counties to vote on liquor issue

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Voters in 11 counties of Kansas will cast ballots Nov. 8 to decide whether their counties should change their status on liquor by the drink in public restaurants, with Wichita and Kansas City, Kan., citizens deciding whether to embrace open bars.

Under a 1986 constitutional amendment, Kansas voters not only legalized sale of liquor by the drink in public restaurants but with the same vote decided whether their county would allow liquor to be sold by the drink in restaurants doing at least 30 percent of their business in food sales.

This year, counties had the option of changing their status from what it has been the past two years. Those options included reverting to no liquor by the drink in restaurants — but still allowing it in private clubs — or removing the 30 percent food requirement to legalize bars, or trying again to legalize liquor in restaurants if they rejected it in 1986.

Boards of county commissioners could submit the issue by resolution, or citizens could initiate a vote by obtaining signatures equal to 10 percent of the number of votes cast in the last general election.

Neither the secretary of state's office nor the Kansas Association of Counties conducted surveys to determine which counties have liquor propositions on their ballots next month.

However, the Rev. Richard Taylor, president of Kansans for Life at Its Best, which opposes liberalization of the state's liquor laws, contacted all county clerks.

His survey, which he made public Wednesday, showed six counties are voting on removing the food requirement to permit bars. They are Sedgwick, which includes Wichita; Wyandotte, which includes Kansas City, Kan.; Ellis, which includes Hays; Sherman, which includes Goodland, and Russell and Rush.

Counties that rejected liquor by the drink in public restaurants in 1986 and are trying again to get it passed are Harvey, which includes Newton, and Chase and Kearny.

One county, Stafford, that rejected it two years ago is taking the quantrum leap to open bars, bypassing the 30 percent food requirement.

Taylor said the Stafford referendum came as a surprise, because few people had taken note of a provision in the 1986 amendment that allowed a county voting a second time on the issue to go all the way from no public restaurant liquor to bars.

Only one county is trying to reverse its 1986 action and vote out liquor by the drink in restaurants. That is Finney County, which includes Garden City.

Taylor pointed out that Finney County misworded its proposition on the ballot. If its referendum is approved, Finney County technically would ban private liquor clubs as well as abolishing liquor by the drink in restaurants.

Israeli bombing raid kills 6

By The Associated Press

DAMOUR, Lebanon — Israeli warplanes attacked Palestinian guerrilla bases at Sidon and Beirut on Wednesday, killing at least six people, including a man identified as a senior PLO commander.

A family of six and three other people were missing and feared dead under the rubble in Mieh Mieh, a refugee camp outside Sidon that suffered the greatest damage. Police said 41 people were wounded, all but one at Mieh Mieh.

In south Lebanon, Israeli soldiers and allied militiamen poured artillery fire on positions of Lebanese guerrillas in and around Mashgara, police reported.

Jets struck targets outside the southern port and the capital 4½ hours apart in the third and fourth raids since a suicide Shiite Moslem car bomber killed eight Israeli soldiers a week ago in the border "security zone" Israel maintains in south Lebanon.

At least 27 people have been killed and 16 wounded in the four raids, which bring the total Israel air strikes in Lebanon this year to 19. Casualties in all the raids, by police count, have been at least 95 killed and 184 wounded.

"The raid near Sidon is one of the heaviest, if not the heaviest, in Lebanon this year," said a police spokesman, whose name cannot be used because of regulations. He said it caused "the most severe destruction in Mieh Mieh since the 1982 Israeli invasion."

Among those killed in the refugee camp was Col. Mustafa Daoud, 40, commander of the Fatah Militia, a guerrilla group of about 1,000 fighters from the mainstream Fatah faction led by PLO chief Yasser Arafat, police said.

Most of the wounded were guerrillas and included Col. Mohsen Hallak, commander of the 1,000-man Beit al-Maqdes (Jerusalem) battalion, another Palestine Liberation Organization unit, the police spokesman reported. He said some others were officers of Force 17, the PLO security service.

Police said the second Israeli raid struck bases of pro-Syrian Palestinian factions in the hills of Khalde and Aramoun on Beirut's southern fringe. They described the main target as a base behind a hilltop monastary overlooking the towns of Damour and Naameh, midway along the coastal highway between Beirut and Sidon. The port city is about 25 miles south of Beirut.

The raiding jets struck twice within 15 minutes, firing 10 air-to-surface rockets, four of which failed to explode, the report said. Journalists were not allowed to approach the base, which consists of half a dozen tents belonging to the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine.

Syrian anti-aircraft batteries near Beirut airport and Aramoun opened fire at the attackers.

Company donates equipment to Department of Chemistry

By Kathy Winklhofer
Collegian Reporter

Conoco Inc. has donated an electron microprobe to the Department of Chemistry. The machine would cost about $1 million if purchased this year, said Peter Sherwood, associate professor of chemistry.

Sherwood and five graduate students will use the machine, which was moved from King Hall to the new chemistry/biochemistry building. It will take about a year to get the machine in proper working order, Sherwood said.

The department went to Ponca City, Okla. in April to get the machine. The machine, which weighs four tons, had to be dismantled for the move.

The microprobe uses a beam of electrons to identify the elements present in samples. Inside the machine is a scanning electron microscope which scans the sample's surface.

Sherwood said the microprobe user sees a highly magnified picture of the sample's surface. It magnifies objects as small as 100 angstroms. An angstrom equals a hundred-millionth of a centimeter. The machine can also photograph the sample.

Sherwood uses the machine to examine surface corrosion and oxidation in metal samples. The machine identifies the products of corrosion in the samples. This helps in learning why the elements were formed. With this information, materials with better corrosion-resistant properties can be made, Sherwood said.

Conoco purchased the electron microprobe in 1980 to study elements found in rock and mineral samples. Sherwood said it is necessary to test rock samples to determine oil content.

Sherwood said he will use the machine mainly for surface science, the study of the surface of objects. Sherwood and his graduate students are researching corrosion, the chemical process which gradually dissolves or eats away a substance.

Conoco Inc. also has made other donations to the department. In February 1988, the company made a cash donation for scholarships, said Dale Hawley, acting department head and professor in chemistry. They have also made cash donations to engineering departments.

Airline teaching class in flight training

By Susan Reimer
Collegian Reporter

Have you ever dreamed of flying into the sunset? Have you ever wanted to fly to Chicago or New York for the weekend? If you have, here is your chance to earn a pilot's license to fulfill that dream.

Capitol Airlines at the Manhattan Airport is offering a pilot-licensing course for area residents.

Richard Shaw, a spring 1988 graduate of K-State, is a flight instructor with Capitol Airlines.

"This class is for those people who have always wanted to get their license. My students are very eager," he said.

Six of Shaw's nine students are K-State students.

The course's cost of $1,340 includes a minimum of 40 hours of flying time, which is required by the Federal Aviation Administration for a pilot's license. The price includes ground school and instructional materials, Shaw said.

"It is a home-study course where the student reads the lesson then comes in for air time," he said.

Shaw prefers students to come in twice a week for one-hour lessons, so the course lasts four to six months.

There are no prerequisites for the class. To receive a pilot's license, the applicant must be 17 and must pass a medical examination, Shaw said.

Since this is not a classroom course, the students are eager and interested, which Shaw said are the aspects he likes most about teaching the course.

"It makes it easier on me, since they want to be in the plane," he said.

Shaw's first lesson is on the basic aerodynamics of a plane and flight preparation.

"Students do not fly alone until they have a minimum of 15 hours in the air with an instructor," Shaw said.

The license is for a single-engine land plane, meaning the plane lands on the ground instead of water, he said.

"Some of my students already have trips planned (for) after they complete the course," Shaw said.

Capitol Airlines is the only airline in Manhattan offering flight instruction, he said.

The airline is a fixed-base operator, Shaw said. They sell fuel, perform maintenance, rent planes and offer instruction.

To give people an idea of what flying is like and to see if they want to take the course, the airline offers an introductory flight for $10.

Ag Careers Day continues tradition

By Jody Hundley
Collegian Reporter

Kansas high school students will get a taste of K-State's rich tradition in agriculture Saturday by participating in the College of Agriculture's Ag Careers Day.

Ag Careers Day targets high school and transfer students — the prospective students of the college, said John Riley, assistant director of resident instruction in the College of Agriculture.

In September, the Ag Careers Fair was conducted for current K-State agriculture students.

Walter Woods, dean of the College of Agriculture, will give a brief presentation about agriculture careers in general. Then Brent Rockers, a 1982 graduate of K-State, will speak about the "graduate's perspective."

"Rockers will offer a fatherly advice-type approach by showing what should be done as a senior in high school in order to prepare for college," Riley said.

Rockers is employed by Ciba-Geigy Agriculture Chemicals in Pittsburg.

David Mugler, director of resident instruction, will speak about academic programs in agriculture. Melanie Mainquist, president of Agriculture Student Council, will also speak. The Agriculture Ambassadors will present skit.

The second part of the program consists of visits to the college's departments.

Kindal Barnes, senior in agronomy and Ag Careers Day coordinator, said work for the day is progressing smoothly.

"We're getting help from (agriculture) students wherever it's needed," said Barnes. "There are more reservations (from prospective students) at this time than last year."

Barnes also said the Ag Careers Day helps students get an idea of the types of agriculture careers possible.

Students will have two departmental visits, each 40 minutes long, which will introduce them to the different areas within the College of Agriculture, Riley said.

"All departmental presentations are planned by the students. It's another way to encourage students to take leadership roles," he said.

"This is a good chance for students to ask questions. Departmental clubs will also discuss their activities," Riley said. "The College of Agriculture offers lots of extracurricular activities and stresses professional and personal development."

Riley said about 200 students, ranging from eighth-graders to seniors in high school, are expected to attend.

"This is about what we had last year. The number varies with the high school activities held the night before," Riley said.

Riley said once high school students see the campus, they realize it is not as big or "awesome" as they thought.

"They begin to realize the opportunities in agriculture that they had not anticipated," he said.

Riley said the Ag Careers Day is meant to be educational in the morning and fun in the afternoon. A sack lunch, made by Block and Bridle, and a ticket to the K-State-Oklahoma State game are provided free to attending students.

Ag Careers Day is sponsored by the Agriculture Student Council.

China readies for satellite market

By The Associated Press

XICHANG, China — Turbaned peasants trudge by, prodding water buffalo and lugging firewood, and taking little notice of the towering hollow structure from another time and for another universe.

Surrounded by green mountains in an isolated corner of Sichuan province, the Xichang Satellite Center and its 11-story gantry is the takeoff point for China's entry into the international satellite launching market.

The base, normally closed to foreigners, is on display as China enters final negotiations with Washington on issuing U.S. licenses for the launch of three Hughes Aircraft Co. satellites. They would be the first American satellites put into orbit by a non-Western country.

Agreement has been reached on safeguarding U.S. technology secrets during the launch process and establishing China's liability in case of accident.

Officials meet again in November to work out how to ensure that Chinese prices, much lower than those charged by the U.S. space shuttle or European Ariane services, won't jeopardize the American commercial launching industry.

Xichang's first commercial venture could come as early as 1989 with the launch of Westar 6, an old satellite retrieved by the space shuttle in 1984, for AsiaSat, a Hong Kong consortium.

An Australian company, AUSSAT, intends to put two Hughes communications satellites into orbit in the early 1990s.

China decided in the mid-1970s to build a rocket base in this remote area because it is easy to defend, sparsely populated and has clear winter days well suited for launches.

But while the base is part of China's march to the 21st century, it is surrounded by reminders of the Middle Ages.

The site is 40 miles north of Xichang, a small town accessible from the provincial capital of Chengdu by twice-a-week airplane flights or a 12-hour train ride.

On the road from Xichang, women wash clothes in streams, water buffalo pull wooden plows through rice paddies, and barefoot children scamper around mud-baked houses. Farmers spread their grain on the road so truck wheels can help grind it.

Between launches, the base looks abandoned.

The site, run by the People's Liberation Army, employs 1,200, but new buildings to house the 141-foot Long March III rockets and satellites during pre-launch testing are almost empty.

Windows in the gantry blown out during the last launch in March have yet to be replaced.

About four miles from the launch pad, only two engineers sat at monitors in the gymnasium-like control center. A smaller control center, built into the mountains at the launch site, was not shown to visitors.

Site officials say the simplicity of the operation is a main reason for its competitive prices and high success rate. China reportedly can undercut space shuttle or Ariane prices by as much as 30 percent.

Tong Lianjie, deputy director of the center, said the price advantage is "mainly because our launching facilities are simple, reliable and practical."

Newspapers publish birthday message

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Seven Lebanese newspapers published a letter to U.S. hostage Terry Anderson Wednesday on the eve of his 41st birthday — his fourth in captivity — from a committee of journalists working for his release.

Anderson, chief Middle East correspondent for The Associated Press, is the longest-held of the 14 foreign hostages held in Lebanon. He was kidnapped March 16, 1985, by a pro-Iranian Shiite Moslem faction calling itself Islamic Jihad, or Holy War.

"Your colleagues in the U.S. and throughout the world salute you today on your birthday," said the letter published Wednesday in the newspapers. Anderson's birthday actually is today.

The Christian Voice of Lebanon and the Moslem Voice of the Nation radio stations broadcast the statement in Arabic against a background of somber music.

The stations also announced that they will broadcast the statement in English on Thursday in the hope that Anderson, who does not speak Arabic, would be able to hear it.

The papers also published a photograph of American country music star Hank Williams Jr. receiving a bracelet from Anderson's sister, Peggy Say.

The bracelet includes the captive's name and the date of his abduction. Williams signed a birthday card for Anderson as did other stars before the Country Music Association awards show began in Nashville, Tenn. Oct. 10.

The papers that published the letter to Anderson included Al-Haqiqa, the daily publication of the mainstream Shiite Amal militia.

Theater group will design faces in annual Halloween fundraiser

By Heather Huntington
Collegian Reporter

Faces that horrify mortals can be tough to find, but this Halloween the K-State Players are making the job of being terrifying a little easier.

The group will be applying Halloween make-up on students Saturday from 4 p.m. to 8 p.m. and Monday from 5 p.m. to 8 p.m. on the second floor of the Union.

The organization has done everything from Mickey Mouse to the four members of the band Kiss, said Cynthia McCully, president of the K-State Players and junior in theater.

"If you come in with an idea, we'll make something up," she said.

"It's fun to get a really elaborate make-up job. It impresses people," she said.

Both area goblins and the K-State Players benefit.

"It's a fund-raiser, and it's a way to show off our skills," said Mike Kinney, sophomore in humanities.

"If you come in with an idea, we'll make something up."
—Cynthia McCully president, K-State Players

"I think it's a way for the group to perform a service and, at the same time, become more visible," said Cathy Anderson, associate professor of speech.

It also provides training for young theater majors in in the use of make-up, she said.

Applying make-up at Halloween is part of a long-standing tradition for the K-State Players.

The project dates back to the early 1970s, said Carl Hinrichs, associate professor in speech. The project has been an annual event for about 15 years, he said.

The art of theater make-up has a tradition of its own.

"As theater students, it's part of our curriculum, but the skill is handed down from actor to actor," said Kinney.

"There are some really good make-up artists in the department who have been here for four or five years," McCully said.

To pay for the make-up, the club will ask for donations. The amount of the donation varies with the amount of make-up the artist uses.

Site verification offered

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan has offered the Soviet Union an on-site inspection proposal that will make a nuclear arms treaty effectively verifiable while protecting "legitimate U.S. secrets and interests," the State Department said Wednesday.

Charles Redman, the department spokesman, said the president recently made a number of verification-related decisions, "including some on the approach we will take to so-called suspect site inspections."

But he said he will not comment on details while the U.S.-Soviet arms reduction talks are continuing in Geneva.

Redman said "considerable progress" has been made at the Geneva talks in a number of areas but that "much still remains to be done."

"Our intention in the START talks is to flesh out the details of our position, including the details of a START verification regime, so that there will be a complete U.S. position on the table in Geneva," he said

"START will have the most extensive verification regime in history, well beyond that of the verification measures of the INF (Intermediate-range Nuclear Forces) treaty," the spokesman said.

Redman added that "we are convinced that these provisions will make the treaty effectively verifiable. At the same time, we must be careful to protect legitimate U.S. secrets and interests. ... We believe the proper balance has been made between those two considerations."

Redman also said the United States has completed its negotiating position on space-based defenses with proposals intended to "complement our initiative to permit the development, testing and deployment of all space-based sensors ..."

"This element does not represent any change in longstanding U.S. policy on the ABM (Anti-Ballistic Missile) Treaty and its proper interpretation," he said, adding that administration policy on the conduct of the Strategic Defense Initiative, as worked out with Congress, also is unchanged.

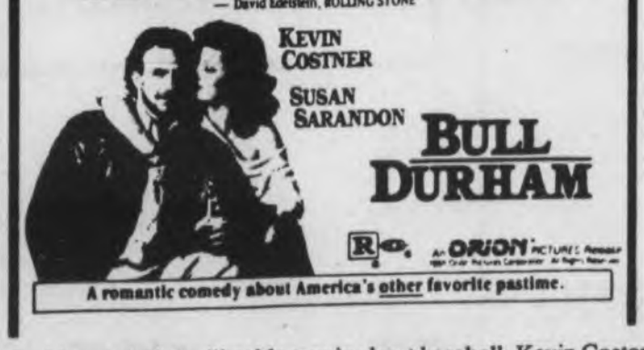
Just for Laughs

"PERFECTION."
Richard Corliss, Time



To any showing of the film "WISH YOU WERE HERE" bring a postcard that says "Wish you were here" and get 50¢ off the $1.75 admission price!

Set in a seaside town on the south coast of England in the 1950s and shot in sunny flesh tones, this English movie has a satirical yet dreamlike texture. The film is about an uncontrollably ribald girl named Lynda who flaunts her sexuality the same way she flaunts "taboo" words. The film is based on the early years of Cynthia Payne, who was the inspiration for the madam in the other British hit film, PERSONAL SERVICES. Rated R. Today, October 27, 3:30, Little Theatre; 7:30 p.m., Forum Hall.

There will be a giveaway on Oct. 28 & 29 at the 7 p.m. showings of Bull Durham. The winners (one at each show) will win a free large hot dog with toppings and a 16 oz. pop from the Union Food Service.

In this wonderfully likeable movie about baseball, Kevin Costoner stars as an almost has-been pitcher who is hired by the Triple A Durham Bulls to help a talented but undirected young pitcher. Susan Sarandon plays the team's spiritual and sexual guardian with a repertoire of high philosophical floaters and lofty theological spitters. BULL DURHAM presents a funny, sexy, literate love story about minor league baseball. Rated R. Friday, October 28, and Saturday, October 29. 7 & 9:30 p.m. Forum Hall. KSU ID required. Admission $1.75.

hibit such secret agreements if public funds were involved, and other lawmakers were calling for a public disclosure of terms of the Stephan-Tomson settlement.

Phelps said the Kansas press was speculating on the settlement terms during that time.

Michaud suggested in his cross examination that some members of Phelps Charter have made statements in the past that as many as a dozen people say are wrong.

"If that's true, why did your firm refer a case to my firm less than six months ago?" Phelps replied, adding she could provide documentation of the referral.

"That's not true," Michaud said.

U.S. District Judge Dale E. Saffels denied a motion by Tomson's attorney, Sabin Thompson of Nashville, to introduce as evidence a letter from Michaud's firm that a case from the Wichita firm had withdrawn due to conflict of interest and had been taken over by Phelps Chartered.

The original suit was settled by a cash payment of $24,000, which Phelps said was delivered by former attorney general Vern Miller in cash to her Topeka office, plus other considerations.

Phelps testified that both Tomson and Stephan wanted the terms to remain confidential, but Hay read from a deposition given by Tomson, quoting her as saying she "didn't care all along if people knew."

the waterfowl season and reduce the bag limit. If we don't do something now, it may be too late in the future," said Todd Turner, junior in park and resource management.

"I definitely feel that the new regulation on the limit had a major affect on the type of ducks we shot. Trying only to shoot mallards, since our bag limit is no more than three ducks, made our shooting more selective," said Sean Mills, senior in agriculture economics.

Mills said the shortened season will reduce the amount of time he spends hunting.

Although the regulations are stricter, the three students said they plan to hunt as much as they can.

Haley said the season has three segments: from Oct. 22 to Oct. 28; from Nov. 10 to Dec. 4; and from Dec. 26 to Jan. 1.

Red Cross tests for AIDS

Pamphlet screens donors

By Kendra Gensemer
Collegian Reporter

The decision to give blood is not the only decision possible donors must make. The American Red Cross Bloodmobile now also requires people to decide whether their blood is safe.

The Bloodmobile will be in the Union from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. today.

The spread of aquired immune deficiency syndrome and the danger of contracting the virus through blood transfusions have brought about changes in the blood donating process, said Kalen Larson, assistant director of communications for the American Red Cross in Wichita.

Before giving blood, every possible donor is handed a pamphlet that reads, "If you are a man who has had sex with another man since 1977, you must not give blood or plasma."

The pamphlet lists nine conditions under which people are at risk of spreading AIDS, including ever having injected illegal drugs, having had sex with a male or female prostitute in the last six months and ever having sex with a person with the AIDS virus.

The prescreening process for donating blood begins with the pamphlet. In a confidential area called "Q Area," donors must read the pamphlet and sign a form which verifies that it was read and understood, said Dodie Faulconer, head nurse for the K-State Bloodmobile.

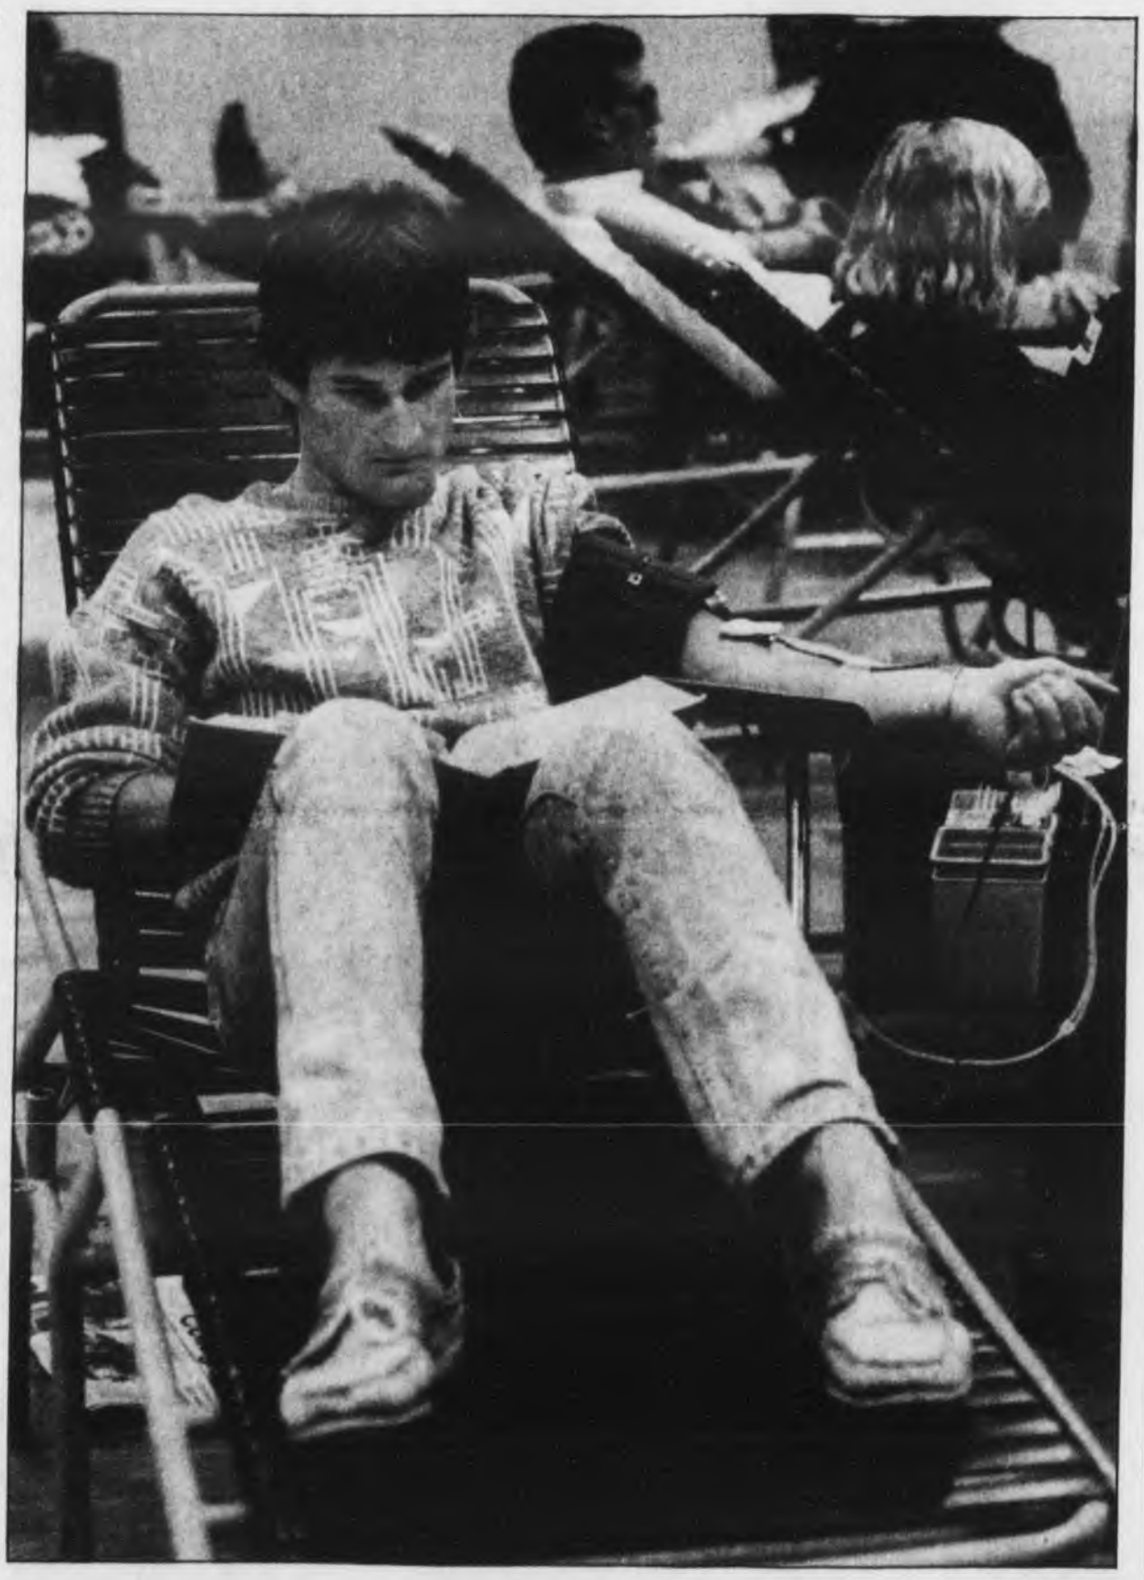
Possible donors then decide from that information whether their blood should be donated. A computer bar code is used by the donor on another confidential form to indicate whether the Red Cross should use the blood, Faulconer said.

"No one can read the form, only a computer," she said. The person can go ahead and donate blood to retain confidentiality.

When the information reaches the lab in Wichita, a computer reads the bar codes. The computer rejects blood with bar codes indicating the donor may be at risk of carrying the virus. The computer will continue to reject the names of suspected virus carriers if they ever donate blood again, Faulconer said.

Once a donor makes a decision "they have two days to think about it and anonymously notify the Red Cross if they change their mind," Faulconer said. Donors who indicated that they may have been exposed to the AIDS virus cannot change the information they gave to the Red Cross.

She said the Red Cross screens for AIDS as well as other diseases such as hepatitis and syphilis. Donors cannot get AIDS or any other disease by giving blood.



Larson said the blood is tested using the "Elisa Test."

"This is a very sensitive test which will pick up anything that might be an antibody to AIDS," she said.

If the results are positive, the blood is sent to a more sophisticated Red Cross lab for a second test.

"There is such a thing as 'false positive,'" Larson said. "Some people have things in their system like the AIDS antibodies but actually are not," she said.

Senate studies policy revisions

By Kendra Gensemer
Staff Writer

Student Senate Thursday considered revising unclear legislation that has been the cause of controversial impeachment proceedings this semester, but, after an hour of debate, it referred the bill to the Senate Operations Committee.

Senate discussed clarification of the attendance, visitation, and office-hour policies which were not clearly understood by senators and resulted in the consideration of impeachment of 26 senators.

Past legislation established attendance policies for Senate meetings, office hours and group visitations. Parliamentarian Justin Sanders said the legislation caused problems because the policies were not in the front of senators' minds.

For this reason, he said, it has been customary for the Senate chairman to restate the policies.

Sanders and some other senators are in favor of putting attendance policies in the Senate Standing Rules of Order.

Beginning each term, Senate establishes and votes on its own set of rules — standing rules of order — for conducting business.

If the attendance policy is written in the chairman's policy then only the chairman makes the decision on the policy, he said.

If written in the standing rules, the entire Senate votes on it and "it is more available to them than in legislation," Sanders said.

Standing rules also serve as precedent from one Senate term to the next. Senate discussed revising the standing rules so the new Senate would have something to follow.

"I think we should amend the standing rules for reference and for precedence so the new Senate will have something tangible (to base it own standing rules on)," said Mary Jo Lampe, operations committee chairwoman.

Rattan Nath, graduate senator, said the intent of an attendance policy is to measure each senator's participation. The present attendance rules do not do this, he said.

The committee is making general revisions to the Student Government Association Constitution which will be presented to the Senate Nov. 10, Lampe said.

In other business, Senate allocated $700 to publish 400 copies of the University Activities Board Handbook.

Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities and Senate adviser, said the handbook contains rules, regulations and information vital to University organizations.

Senate approved 1988-89 final allocations and replacement of members to two University committees.

Joni Hays, graduate in student counseling and personal services, was appointed to the Educational Opportunity Fund Committee.

Kim Gensch, junior in apparel and textile marketing, and Jeff Bernhardt, senior in business administration, were appointed to the Parking Citation Appeals Board.

Carter criticizes media coverage

By Randy Short
Campus Editor

ATLANTA — Former President Jimmy Carter, speaking to 1,000 college journalists from across the nation, criticized the media's hounding of presidential campaign issues while comparing himself to Michael Dukakis.

Carter, who spoke at the annual Associated Collegiate Press-College Media Adviser national convention in Atlanta, attributed his re-emergence in politics to what he called a forgiving by the Democratic Party for his losing to Ronald Reagan in 1980.

Comparing previous presidential campaigns, Carter said he has never seen such a low standard of accuracy and substance in campaign reporting.

Carter said the attempted character assassinations of chief executive hopefuls is an example of the "maximum flexibility in telling the truth ... and has been an unprecedented inclination of the media in the last several years."

Carter said the next president will not have the same protected image in the eyes of the American people that Reagan has maintained. The next president will be more vulnerable to the media, he said.

The intense investigation of Sen. Dan Quayle's academic background exemplified the type of coverage that is becoming the norm. The negative

More, better facilities planned

Campus Facilities

By Stuart Puls
Collegian Reporter

Editor's note: This is the final part of a five-part series on campus facilities.

For 125 years, the main sight on campus has been limestone buildings. Don't expect too much change in the next 20 years.

"Limestone will continue to be a major part of our buildings. Kansas limestone is very appropriate for K-State," said Vince Cool, associate director for facilities planning.

But while the outsides of the buildings will stay the same, the insides will become more modern, he said.

Cool said the inside structures will continue to be upgraded and modernized in the form of renovations and additions to meet advancing technology.

Two buildings that will experience renovation and additions are Throckmorton Hall and Calvin Hall.

Throckmorton, built in 1981, and Calvin, constructed in 1908, are both in the books for remodeling by 1995, he said.

Earlier this month, President Ronald Reagan approved a $1.35 million federal appropriation to put into motion the planning and construction of Phase II, an addition to Throckmorton. This addition would move K-State one step closer to becoming the home of a national biotech center.

Phase II will cost nearly $27 million and will be the University's most costly building to date. The cost of the new addition will be shared equally by the state of Kansas and the federal government. Phase II is projected to be completed in 1993 or 1994.

Phase I of Throckmorton was completed in 1981. The hall is named after Ray Throckmorton, a former dean of the College of Agriculture who died in 1979.

Phase II will consist of two four-story additions to the east and west sides of Throckmorton. This will give the building 161,000 square feet of classroom and lab space, making it comparable to Ackert Hall in size and working area, Cool said.

Additional greenhouses will be built north of the building. The Kansas Legislature appropriated $1.06 million for the construc-

BBC overhauling world image

LONDON — The BBC's worldwide radio service, recognized by millions as the quintessential voice of Britain, is dropping some of its upper-class accents and imperial signature tunes in an overhaul of its stately image.

Its boss is worried that "the Beeb" is sounding pompous and out-of-date.

This doesn't mean the BBC's external English-language service plans to use announcers with broad northern England accents or vowel-slewing Cockney tones.

And it won't get rid of the chimes of Big Ben, the cricket scores and the reassuring hourly announcement, "This is London."

But nearly six decades after the calm, measured voice of the British Broadcasting Corporation began beaming around the globe, its executives have decided it risks "verging on the pompous," said John Tusa, managing director of the corporation's World Service.

BRIEFLY ACROSS THE NATION

Sunday brings extra hour

WASHINGTON — Americans face two alarming reminders this weekend: "Change your Clock, Change Your Battery."

That's the motto set by Congress and the nation's fire chiefs in hopes that people will take a few moments from the extra hour they'll gain, with the annual return to standard time, to replace the batteries in their smoke detectors.

Fall and winter are seasons when household fires are most common, and safety officials say many of the 5,000 fire deaths each year could be avoided if smoke detectors were properly maintained. Smoke alarms often fail to work simply because their batteries are old or missing.

The time change officially occurs at 2 a.m. local time in most states Sunday, moving back to 1 a.m. standard time after more than six months on daylight saving. The usual advice is to set the clock back an hour before going to bed Saturday night.

Dusk will come earlier in the evenings now, with the extra daylight shifted back to the morning.

Daylight saving time will return next April 2, shifting an hour of light back to evenings for cookouts, sports and other warm-weather activities.

Wheat disease testing begins

BLACKVILLE, S.C. — Field testing begins next week at Clemson University's Edisto Research and Education Center on a genetically engineered microorganism created to combat a major wheat disease

The project, approved by the Environmental Protection Agency on Oct. 4, is the second such field test to be conducted by Clemson with the Monsanto Co.

Scientists at Monsanto created the new microorganism in an attempt to fight a wheat fungus disease known as take-all, Clemson microbiologist Ellis Kline said.

"We've found some take-all in South Carolina, and once it gets started there's the potential for it to become persistent," Kline said.

Wheat is not a major crop in South Carolina, but it is becoming more popular because it can produce respectable yields on the state's soils.

BRIEFLY IN THE REGION

Dole: Democrats giving up

KANSAS CITY, Kan. — Sen. Bob Dole of Kansas believes the presidential race is over, and he is urging George Bush to do more stumping for Republican Senate candidates.

Dole predicted Wednesday that Bush would win big.

"It's over. The gap widens every day," he said. "I move around enough to know there's no excitement out there. I think there's been a lot of Democrats giving up on (Democratic candidate Michael) Dukakis."

Dole, the Senate minority leader, said that he has traveled 78,000 miles since April to help campaign for GOP Senate candidates and that Bush should make more of an effort.

Official rejects delay request

TOPEKA — A federal official has rejected a request that could have delayed the U.S. Supreme Court's consideration of a dispute between Kansas and Colorado over water levels in the Arkansas River.

Kansas officials have accused Colorado of "stealing" water from the river, which flows through southeast Colorado and southern Kansas.

Kansas Attorney General Robert T. Stephan filed suit against Colorado in December 1985, claiming that Colorado had violated the terms of the Arkansas River Compact, an interstate agreement on water use signed in 1949. The Supreme Court agreed to hear the matter in March of 1986.

K-Stater develops talent, business as auctioneer

By Jenny Reschke
Collegian Reporter

Although not everyone may trust a fast-talker with a sometimes ridiculous sales pitch, this talent may be the key to the success for a K-State sophomore.

Despite being a full-time animal science major, Jon Bruning is also mastering a potentially lucrative trade — auctioneering.

This interest began when he was about 15. He started buying livestock for himself on weekends in his hometown of Superior, Neb. His father, an auctioneer, also influenced him, Bruning said.

To develop the skill, Bruning attended Missouri Auction School in Kansas City, Mo., in the summer of 1987. During two weeks of intensive training eight hours a day, Bruning's ability began to grow. At the end of the session, he was chosen from the 106 other students to be featured in area newspapers.

Staff/Mike Venso

Interested in auctioneering since he was 15, K-State sophomore Jon Bruning (far right) developed his skill after two weeks of intensive training in 1987 at the Missouri Auction School in Kansas City, Mo.

Because of the media attention, Bruning was invited to auction at one of the largest livestock companies in Kansas, Winter Livestock in Dodge City. The pressure of going solo at a large sale, however, was a little intimidating, he said.

"I was nervous, which is a weakness. I had never been to a livestock company that large or had seen cattle sell so fast. Everything went fine, but my hands were shaking."

To stop his hands from shaking, Bruning practiced while holding two pennies on his fingertips.

Maintaining the ability to speak with the necessary speed and accuracy also requires regular practice, he said.

"I always have to practice numbers and tongue-twister drills as often as I can," he said.

Bruning spends about 30 minutes practicing to warm up before a sale.

Bruning said that working at the Winter Livestock Company is his biggest achievement, especially considering that the owner expressed interest in hiring him after graduation.

However, Bruning wanted to obtain a college degree before entering the competitive field of auctioneering. He formed the Bruning Auction Associates with four fraternity brothers. The team works at sales in area towns and in Bruning's hometown.

"I've got such great people that work for me. They haven't made a mistake yet."

This business arrangement has been paying off. For his work, Bruning typically receives eight to 10 percent of the total sales, and his associates receive prenegotiated wages for their work.

Bruning said he is aware of the importance of the factors that affect his career.

"First, you've got to keep a clean reputation. You never cheat anybody," he said. Almost equally important is an auctioneer's clarity, combined with speed.

In addition to the financial rewards, auctioneering is exciting and challenging, Bruning said.

"It's something a lot of people would like to be able to do," he said. "I like it because I am in control of the market, and knowing everything that's going on is exciting."

Bruning said he finds a challenge in influencing people to buy items they didn't think they needed.

"You get people in the crowd to start having fun, and they'll all be on your side. You keep them laughing at reasons to use something," he said.

Bruning remembers one sale where he managed to sell some cheap plastic coffee cups for much more than they were worth by entertaining the crowd with a story.

"I gave the crowd a speech about the problems with coffee spilling in the car, how it burns you," he said. "Then I convinced them that they could save a $5,000 car by buying these cups with lids."

He sold the six plastic cups for $5.

Looking toward the future, Bruning has a definite goal. "I want to be the best auctioneer in the country."

Students face final drop day

By The Collegian Staff

Today is the last day to withdraw from a class this semester.

Drop/add forms are available at the dean's office of each college and from academic advisers. Several colleges require signatures before the Enrollment Center will process the withdrawal. The colleges of Agriculture, Architecture and Design, and Education require signatures from both the college dean and academic adviser. The College of Human Ecology requires an adviser's signature. The College of Engineering requires the dean's signature, adviser's signature and the drop/add form must be stamped.

The Enrollment Center, located in the basement of Farrell Library, will accept drop/add forms from 8:15 a.m. to 4:45 p.m.

A withdrawal is recorded on the transcript. If the students retake the course, the "W" remains, but the grade received upon completion of the course will be listed separately.

Students have the option of completing the class.

The best of advice from the best advisers

Commentary

KARLA REDELSHEIMER
Collegian Columnist

Parents are famous for giving advice. They tell us to wear a hat when it's cold outside — "you lose most of your body heat from your head," — they tell us that if we want something in life we have to work for it, and they insist we chew vitamin pills that come in psychedelic colors and shapes to ensure a strong, healthy body.

Parents (and sometimes grandparents) reserve the right to tell us things we already know, such as, "It's raining outside, you'd better take an umbrella," or, "The car is on empty, you'd better put gas in it." These statements merit the ever-popular "I know, I know," response.

In honor of Parent's Weekend, I've decided to celebrate those words of wisdom, quotable quotes and advice passed down to me from my coaches of life. These coaches can take many forms, they can be parents, teachers, bosses, siblings — basically, anyone who has been living longer than you have.

"Life (pause with sigh) isn't fair." This fact of life is a common response given when coaches of life are sick of hearing their team players complain.

Think about it. The statement is so philosophical that nothing can top it. It's the survival-of-the-fittest theory condensed into a short and sweet statement.

Your parents buy your cute (and spoiled) little sister a new sports car while you worked your tail off all through high school to buy a second-hand, puke-green Pacer.

"That's not fair," you whine. You continue with war stories of how you had no social life during those traumatic adolescent years except for your friend, the french fry fryer at Burger Heaven, all to have your own set of wheels and to avoid riding the bus.

After another "That's not fair, I knew you always liked her better," your parents come back with the fact that they are financing your college education. Your cute baby sister, on the other hand, has a full-ride scholarship to Yale. You're still not satisfied, so you utter again, "I don't care, that's still not fair."

"Dear, sometimes life isn't fair," they say with a tad bit of frustration. Just to make sure you've caught on to the fact that this is the end of the discussion they add, "So you better get used to it now."

"Five years from now, this (fill in your own crisis) won't be important." Translated, this means take a Stress Tab, put your life into perspective and get on with it.

The wise man who brought this statement to my attention flunked out of college during his first semester. He returned to a private college the next year, worked his way through school, earned a business degree and graduated with a "C plus" average.

He is now a corporate executive and is making more money than he ever imagined possible. He attributes his success to persistance, willingness to start at the bottom and, finally, knowing how to fake it when he was unsure of himself — which brings me to another piece of advice.

"If you don't believe in yourself, nobody else will — so learn how to fake it." This advice came by way of a writing assignment. The project was to interview a classmate and write about his or her life. The young woman I interviewed said that was the best advice her mother ever gave her.

Her suggestion goes along with the psychological theory that we project ourselves the way we think of ourselves. Remember "The Little Train That Could?" I think I can, I think I can? That's how candidates get elected, and how actors get acting jobs — sort of like Ronald Reagan.

One of the best pieces of advice I've ever received came from my mother. She has this habit of sending me articles, usually about new, painless ways to stay healthy, or just funny stories. The article that stands out was titled "Change What You Can Change."

This particular piece was about how people get stuck in ruts such as a bad relationship or a job they hate. These people often complain and make excuses for not getting out of their particular situations and claim they are powerless over their lives.

The article said to take control over your life (without blaming yourself for past mistakes) and make changes in your life that you have control of. For instance, a person caught in a bad job could look for another job, get more training to move on to a more challenging career or she could change her attitude about her job and learn to appreciate the good things about it.

The advice is great because it applies to virtually any distressing problem in life. It forced me to realize my future was up to me and that if I don't like something, it's up to me to change what I can change.

So take your vitamins, work to achieve your goals, use your umbrella, make sure you have enough gas in your car, and wear a hat when it's cold (even though they look geeky). Finally, don't forget to thank your coaches of life for their advice.

K-State students, staff deserve safe buildings

Imagine what would happen to a business if the public discovered that did its business in an unsafe environment. At least, the business would fix the problem or risk losing customers. Maybe, if the problem was serious enough, long-time consumer-rights champion Ralph Nader would be called in to convince the owner of the importance of safety in the business place.

Imagine what would happen if workers discovered their workplace was unsafe. Provided it hasn't been completely dismantled by the Reagan administration's budget cuts, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration or the workers' union would stand up for employees' right to a safe workplace.

Now, with that in mind, ask how the University can get away with continuing to use several campus buildings that are recognized by the State Fire Department as fire traps.

The very idea seems outrageous. But sadly enough, that seems to be the case.

Aren't students actually customers, paying for higher education or at least a piece of paper certifying their proficiency in various modes of thinking? And as such, aren't they entitled to the same level of safety expected of any businessplace?

And what about faculty and staff? Aren't they entitled to a safe workplace just like any other workers?

Don't students and university employees have enough to worry about with tests, papers, jobs, and everyday stress, without carrying on business transactions in an unsafe environment?

The University has evidently decided to "prioritize," and concern itself first with the residence halls, where people live, rather than the classrooms and labs, where people work.

Surely, the University owes it to those living on its premises to provide safe housing. That does not, however, dissolve it of its responsibility to provide a safe place of business.

The University has an obligation not only to its customers, the students, to provide a safe place for transactions, but also to its employees, the faculty and staff.

Collegian Editorial Policies

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR are always encouraged. Those which pertain to matters of campus and/or public interest are especially encouraged, and are given the highest priority.

Letters should be kept as brief as possible, preferably under 300 words. Those who cannot condense their opinions should consider submiting their letter in the form of a guest column. All letters are subject to editing for space, style and taste.

GUEST COLUMNS are also encouraged. The column should be no longer than two double-spaced, typed pages. If the submission is used as a column and not a letter to the editor, it will be accompanied by the author's photograph.

Ticket refund

Editor,

I want to know where we are supposed to send for a refund from the athletic office — a refund for football tickets.

No, I am not so disappointed with the 'Cats or Stan Parrish. I am upset at the prices of the general admission tickets. At Homecoming, tickets went for $2. I think everyone who bought tickets for that game must have sat in our section, because we could barely find a seat (section 24, row 24, seat 19). I heard rumors that similar tickets were sold for the K-State-Missouri game.

I understand that the reason for the reduced prices is to get some people in the stands. How about the students who paid $30 for seats? Yes, I know the alumni paid much more than we paid, but I bet no one was sitting in their section.

If the K-State athletic office is going to offer individual tickets, they could at least charge $5, which is what season ticket holders pay, per game. They could also set aside a general admission section so they don't sit in ours.

Uniforms needed

Editor,

I remember when I first put on a K-State band uniform. I also remember the pride I felt when I looked in the mirror. So what if it smelled a little musty, the safety pins holding it together were covering up the necessary places and I had just enough thread to sew up the hem that was coming out of the pant-leg?

I had to borrow a button from another jacket. My mom had to put another hook in the collar of my overlay because the original one was not there. If you looked at the stripe going down the leg, you could see it was not white. It was a dim yellow. But that was all OK. I was still proud.

That was seven years ago. Today, someone out there on the field each Saturday at a football game is wearing that same uniform.

The band spends more than 1,600 hours each week preparing a halftime show to entertain you at each football game. That does not include Saturdays, when the members wake up and are practicing by 9 a.m. at the stadium to perfect it. If they are lucky, they get 45 minutes to eat lunch and then they are at the stadium until 5:15 p.m.

Despite the weather, they practice every week, every day except Monday. If it is raining, they practice with umbrellas. If it is snowing, they practice in snowboots. If it is 110 degrees, they practice in as little as possible.

Do you know what they get for it? One hour of credit, no pay. What keeps them going? Their attitude, their pride and spirit, and their drive to entertain more than 300,000 people a year.

Not only does the band do all this, but it also recruits for the University. Each spring a group of band students travel all over the state recruiting students. Statistics show that the recruiting has paid off. Although the band is not solely responsible for the enrollment increase, it does have a hand in it.

So, it goes to show that the K-State marching band has been there for you. Now they are asking for your support to buy new uniforms. The existing ones are almost 20 years old, and band uniforms last, at the most, 10 years. Yes, they do cost a lot of money, but the cost is minimal compared to the hours each member puts in each year and the dedication that the band as a whole has toward the University.

Stars help Amnesty

Editor,

I was appalled to read Mark Schmeller's column of Oct. 11, in which he denounced Amnesty International's methods of raising the public's consciousness of human rights abuses around the world.

Schmeller disliked the fact that Amnesty uses rock musicians as spokespersons because they supposedly do not have the intellect to talk about human rights. Schmeller cited Peter Gabriel's saying that poverty and homelessness should be added to the list of human rights violations as one example of rock stars' incompetence. Schmeller was quick to point out that Gabriel didn't know that Amnesty deals with "defense of political rights, not economic ones." I feel compelled to alert Schmeller to the fact that Amnesty deals with the defense of human rights, not just political rights, and that the Declaration of Independence lists life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness as inalienable human rights. When one is poor and/or homeless, at least one of those rights has been violated.

Schmeller also said that Amnesty was doing so well before they got rock-star spokespersons (Amnesty won the Nobel Peace Prize in 1977) that "Amnesty didn't need rock musicians to speak for them." Schmeller failed to realize that before rock musicians spoke for Amnesty, nobody heard when Amnesty spoke. Whereas now, a very few people do not know about Amensty. I would hazard a guess that in 1977, Schmeller had not heard of Amnesty.

It seems obvious to me that Schmeller believes that Amnesty is OK, as long as it knows its place and doesn't speak out in favor of human rights too loudly.

This is, unfortunately, not a surprising view from a man who thinks that George Bush is a liberal.

Apartheid kills

Editor,

Something that I feel all K-State students should be aware of has come to my attention. Money coming from our enrollment fees is being invested in South Africa and is responsible for the suffering apartheid causes.

The human cost of apartheid is horrible. The South African government lets 30,000 black children a year die of malnutrition so it can continue to export food. Black parents must face the grim reality that 1 in 10 black children die before the age of 4.

Apartheid kills tens of thousands of children every year. By investing in South Africa, we are supporting and profiting from apartheid. The dollars of profit we make are soiled in the blood of children.

If you find it appalling that your money is supporting apartheid, there are many things you can do. The simplest is to find out who your student senator is and ask him or her to support divestment. If you feel very strongly about this, you also might wish to attend an Students for Educational Awareness meeting. SEA is a student organization which meets every Friday at 3:00 p.m. in Union 208 and deals with issues such as divestment from South Africa.

Comedians to perform at McCain

By Julie Thompson
Collegian Reporter

For the second straight year, K-State students can welcome back comedian David Naster in the Coors' Light Comedy Commandos show at 8 tonight in McCain Auditorium.

The event is sponsored by the Union Program Council Eclectic Entertainment Committee.

Naster, who teamed with Taylor Mason last year, will appear with Romie Angelich this year.

Angelich has played at many colleges and comedy clubs, including The Improvisation, Catch a Rising Star, The Comedy Store and Zanies. She began her stand-up career in 1982.

K-State is not new to Naster. He has performed on campus and at clubs in Aggieville. Students seem to welcome him back, said Karen Smaldone, program adviser for the Eclectic Entertainment Committee.

"David is very popular on college campuses throughout the country," said Smaldone. "He appeared at Bushwacker's one month ago."

Naster's television credits include appearances on USA Cable Network's "Night Flight" and "Comedy Tonight." He has appeared with George Burns, The Little River Band, The Manhattan Transfer and others.

The Commandos started in March 1987. Each year they play to more than 900 audiences across the country. The groups are mainly booked on college campuses, Smaldone said. Each performance will feature two comedians. Other members of the commandos include Tim Settimi, Sue Kolinsky, John Ferrentino and a group of three comedians called Mary Wong.

The committee picked Naster because he was playing near Manhattan so the comedy team's travel costs would be lower, said Smaldone.

"We book the acts cooperatively with other schools. It's much cheaper for us to book someone that is going to Lincoln, Nebraska than to have a comedian fly all the way in from New York," she said.

Reserved ticket sales have almost equaled the 500 total ticket sales from last year, she said.

"We've already sold 400 tickets right now. It looks like there will be quite a larger crowd this year," Smaldone said.

Tickets for the performance are $2 and can be purchased at the Union Activities Center or McCain.

Soviets to release political prisoners

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The expressed intention of the Soviet Union to release all political prisoners by the end of the year may refer only to a small group of people, perhaps as few as 20, the State Department said Thursday.

Spokesman Charles Redman said the two superpowers continue to disagree on the definition of exactly what constitutes a political prisoner.

He said Moscow insists the term fits only those actually charged with political offenses, while Washington says it also should include those jailed on "trumped-up charges."

"We've long pressed for the release of Soviet political prisoners," Redman told reporters. "The Soviets finally accept that there are such prisoners, but we continue to disagree on a definition."

He said Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze told U.S. officials during a visit to the United States last month that there were only about 40 such prisoners, all of whom had been convicted for violations of the political and religious articles of the Soviet criminal code.

But Redman said U.S. officials have raised with the Soviets the names of some 200 prisoners, including those jailed on fabricated charges.

West German Chancellor Helmut Kohl told reporters in Moscow on Wednesday that he had been assured in talks with Soviet officials that all political prisoners would be released within 10 weeks.

New licensing tests planned for teachers

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — The Educational Testing Service unveiled plans Thursday for a comprehensive new teacher licensing exam, including computer simulations of classroom situations, to help states weed out incompetents.

"There is a widespread and growing concern about the preparedness and effectiveness of beginning teachers, and we believe that breakthroughs in research and technology make possible a new kind of assessment that will provide greater assistance, fairness and accuracy," said ETS President Gregory R. Anrig.

He expressed hope that the new exam would help put to rest recurring charges by teacher unions and others that existing teacher tests don't accurately assess classroom skills and are unfair to minorities.

Jane Usdan, a spokeswoman for the American Federation of Teachers, called the new test "a step in the right direction. We have said we need to test teachers differently, not only on what they know but on what they can do."

The exam is designed as a licensing tool for beginning teachers and is not intended to assess veteran teachers, Anrig stressed.

Prototypes of the exam, as yet unnamed, will be field tested in 1990, and a final version is expected to be ready in 1992, according to the Lawrenceville, N.J.-based testing service.

The test eventually is expected to replace the National Teacher Exam, a paper-and-pencil multiple choice test taken by some 200,000 teaching candidates a year and administered by ETS.

Mall to hold birthday party; 15,000 expected to attend

By Melissa Paul
Collegian Reporter

The celebration of the Manhattan Town Center's first birthday will climax Saturday with a concert, a car raffle and fireworks.

The Monster Bash concert will begin at 1 p.m. on the Manhattan Town Center Plaza. The opening band will be the Heartland Express, a country band, followed by Mark Selby and the Sluggers, who play a rock, blues and folk mixture. Perfect Strangers and Fair Warning, both rock groups, will finish the concert.

At 8 p.m. the Manhattan Knights of Columbus Council 1832, in conjunction with the Manhattan Town Center, will give away a red 1988 Dodge Omni.

The Knights, donor of the car, asks for a dollar donation with each entry for the giveaway. Proceeds will go to Birthright of Manhattan, a pro-life organization.

The Knights is a charitable, nonprofit Catholic men's organization.

"Our byword is charity," said Walt Cooper, financial secretary for the Knights. "We exist not to take but to give."

The Knights was originally created to support widows and orphans of Catholic men, but now has a wide range of activities to help everyone, not just Catholics, he said.

"Our byword is charity. We exist not to take but to give."

At 9:15, there will be a fireworks display, ending the day's events.

"They're going to be a little bit more spectacular than we had for our grand opening," said Mickey Thompson, advertising and marketing director of the Manhattan Town Center.

Thompson said she expects about 15,000 people this year and that attendance would be helped because of K-State Parents Weekend.

Other highlights of the celebration are juggler/comedian Bryan Wendling, who will be wandering the halls of the mall today, fashion shows and trick-or-treating at the mall merchants for children in costume on Saturday. Sunday there will be a drawing for a weekend for two in New York sponsored by the Manhattan Town Center.

Aggieville deli draws crowd

By Scot Dye
Collegian Reporter

The Rock-a-Belly Bar and Deli in Aggieville has been revamped, remodeled, reopened and is ready to rock 'n' roll.

Rock-a-Belly is a small restaurant with a unique '50s style atmosphere, said Julie Haynes, co-owner of the establishment with her husband.

"Aggieville needed a small, friendly, local place. I'd like to see all kinds of groups comfortable here," Haynes said.

The decor is a major contributor to the restaurant's unique atmosphere, she said.

"I think the thing that most people find interesting about this place is the lamps, ashtrays and stuff on the walls," Haynes said.

The decor was pictured in Haynes' mind, she said, for a year. She went around to garage sales and flea markets to purchase many of the light fixtures, signs and ashtrays displayed inside.

Other unique features include mirrors, small statues, a Howdy Doody doll, various old clocks and a coconut-head collection.

The restaurant has also expanded its hours, Haynes said. It used to be open from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. and attracted a different crowd than it does now. Because of the shorter hours, the restaurant needed a faster customer turnover rate to make a profit.

"I wanted people to get in and get out so I could do a quick turn because I was only open for a short period of time," she said.

Now the restaurant is open until 2 a.m. She said because the place stays open longer, customers can stay longer.

"We went from a quick-turnover atmosphere to a comfortable atmosphere that's conducive to sitting for a long time," Haynes said.

A comfortable atmosphere that allows customers to relax is also important because the restaurant now sells liquor. Haynes said her customers could previously buy beer with their lunches. But now people can come in, order a drink, and stay to enjoy the casual atmosphere.

"When you add liquor and beer, you want people to stay as long as they can," she said.

Remodeling, expanding the hours and the addition of liquor sales has doubled the business' profits, Haynes said.

The facility had to be completely rewired, because the wiring had not been changed since the 1920s, Haynes said.

"We rearranged everything, compacted it — just made better working space. It was kind of stretched out before and disorganized," she said.

Haynes has no major plans for future changes to Rock-a-Belly. She said she will probably continue to just make small changes in the decor.

"People say I should expand, but I like it small — just like it is. I like the coziness and the atmosphere of a small bar. When you're so full that people say 'you should expand,' then I think that's right where you want to be," she said.

Panel offers students career advice

By Becky Jones
Collegian Reporter

A six-member panel offered bakery and milling science students advice on job opportunities in the baking industry during a career seminar Thursday evening at the Manhattan Holidome.

The purpose of the seminar was to encourage students at K-State and the American Institute of Baking to seek employment in the baking industry or related fields, said Dr. Chuck Walker, professor of grain science and industry.

"There's a real demand for employees in the baking industry," Walker said.

The seminar was sponsored by the Young Baking Industry Executives Committee of the American Bakers Association.

Four people who work in the baking industry and two allied members of the industry — packaging and flour suppliers — were the panel members. Allied members have business associations with the industry, but are not bakers, Walker said.

Panel member Linda Evers, director of marketing for the American Bread Company, said the baking industry remains stable, even in hard economic times.

Evers said the industry offers a wide variety of career choices, including employment as sales and marketing directors, production supervisors and personnel managers.

Panel member Larry Bockelman, regional sales manager for ConAgra Inc., a flour supplier for many companies in the baking industry, said graduates in bakery science should also consider a sales option when looking for a job.

Blood

The second test clarifies those cases. If it is positive, the chief medical officer notifies only the donor, Larson said.

Every unit of blood is tested for the AIDS virus, she said, but few test positive.

"We have had an extremely low number of confirmatory tests that have come back positive in this region," Larson said.

This region includes 84 counties in Kansas and 16 counties in northwest Oklahoma.

Brett Bogan, senior in accounting, donated blood Wednesday. He said the prescreening for AIDS did not bother him.

"It is an important enough thing that it should be taken seriously."

Brandy Souter, freshman in interior design and blood donor, agreed.

"I would rather they did that. ... It's confidential so someone is given the opportunity to say 'don't do this.'"

Storytelling aids communication

By Scot Dye
Collegian Reporter

Once upon a time, in a classroom far, far away, a great adventure took place. ... And in the storytelling class taught by Mary Nichols, instructor of speech, the adventure continues every day.

"Storytelling is an oral art. It's part of an oral tradition. Almost all of the stories that you hear were all oral until they were written down by someone," Nichols said.

Nichols said her philosophy for the class is to teach students communication by having them tell stories with a plot and using character voices. She said this teaches the students how to speak proficiently and how to communicate thoughts and ideas.

The class is different from oral communication in that students use sounds, character voices and more energy, Nichols said.

Nichols lets students select the age of their audience and encourages students to tell the stories they want to tell, not the stories the teacher wants to hear.

"The one thing I hope I do is get all the creative juices flowing so (students) know that you don't have to do everything the way that you see it in college," Nichols said.

Students can draw on personal experiences, stories, songs or poems for ideas. Themes vary depending on each student and the audience.

"It varies with age as to your topic. For preschoolers, we're picking topics like colors, animals and imagination. We chose mysteries for the older kids. Almost everybody likes a Sherlock Holmes story," said Chris Cathcart, senior in chemical engineering.

Nichols said topics range from fairy tales and circus stories for the younger children to heavier themes of divorce, death, drugs and sex-role stereotyping for older children.

Nichols said she especially likes to take shy, quiet students and teach them to speak and act in front of an audience.

Many of the students enjoy telling the stories as much as the audience enjoys listening.

"I'm in elementary education and it's given me a lot of good experience ... with children's stories. I'm also getting a lot more experience standing up in front of people and performing or just talking," said Darilyn Ellis, junior in elementary education.

"I did a story not too long ago where I did some animal characters and the kids really got into it. They were doing the characters along with me. They just like to get involved," said Marieke Wolfe, junior in pre-medicine.

Reagan wants new embassy razed

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Reagan recommended Thursday that the new U.S. Embassy in Moscow be razed and rebuilt from the ground up because it is riddled with listening devices that cannot be removed.

Reagan told reporters the United States has "no choice" in the matter "because there's no way to rid it of the many listening devices that were built into it."

"We're going to start and have an American-built one," Reagan said of the embassy.

At the State Department, spokesman Charles Redman said Reagan will urge Congress to permit the virtually completed embassy to be demolished and reconstructed with American-made components to be shipped from the United States and stored in Moscow warehouses under the tightest possible security. He said the building will be assembled by U.S. workers taken to Moscow for that purpose.

The Soviets will not be permitted to move into their newly built embassy in Washington until the United States can occupy its facilities in Moscow, Redman said.

He said that tearing down the existing structure and building a new one under high security conditions will involve "a very elaborate and costly process."

"Obviously we're talking years," Redman said.

But he said the final cost cannot now be estimated because entirely new engineering and architectural plans will have to be drawn up.

He said Reagan's proposed demolition and reconstruction plan was recommended by Secretary of State George P. Shultz following several reviews of the project by U.S. experts.

"This option offers the best overall solution to the problem," Redman said.

He said the rebuilt eight-story embassy will occupy the same site but will be different than the one recommended for demolition. The new structure will incorporate features "to take into account what we have learned" about Soviet eavesdropping capabilities, he said.

"Every precaution will be taken to assure the security of the process," Redman said.

But he repeatedly declined to say exactly what devices the United States had discovered in the new structure, or how they had been installed because "it's never in anyone's interest to let the other guy know what you know."

Redman said that although the cost will be high, it will be worth it to assure a secure and safe working place for U.S. diplomats in Moscow, one that will be expected to serve for at least the next half century.

Meanwhile, he said the United States will continue to renovate the turn-of-the century embassy building it has used since the 1930's to make it safer and more secure until a new building can be occupied.

The first eavesdropping bugs, in structural elements built by Soviet workers and transported to the site, were discovered by U.S. inspectors in the spring of 1987. The United States and the Soviet Union agreed in 1972 to build new, larger embassies in each other's capital.

Incumbents' funds exceed challengers'

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Campaign finance reports received today in the secretary of state's office showed Kansas' incumbent members of Congress are continuing to raise far more money for their re-election campaigns than their challengers as the Nov. 8 election approaches.

The report of 5th District Republican Rep. Bob Whittaker showed that despite the fact he already had a campaign fund of $400,000, the bulk of what Whittaker spent on his campaign during the first 19 days of October went for a mailing to constituents seeking more contributions.

Whittaker's report on campaign receipts and expenditures for the Oct. 1-19 period, which is required by federal law from all candidates who raise $5,000 or more, showed he had received $20,726 to that point this month and had spent $2,539.

The biggest expenditure listed by Whittaker was $2,116 paid to a Maryland firm on Oct. 14 for a "fund raising mailer."

Whittaker reported collecting $102,085 in contributions this year and spending $46,430, and listed a cash balance on hand as of Oct. 19 of $418,961.

His Democratic opponent in next month's election, John A. Barnes, had not filed a report, but would not be required to file one if he didn't break the threshold for donations.

Among the other incumbents with opposition, Democrats Dan Glickman and Jim Slattery and Republican Jan Meyers also continued to raise large amounts of money compared to their opponents.

Glickman's report showed the 4th District incumbent raised $52,582 during the 19-day period to start this month and spent $71,351. He showed contributions for 1988 of $292,539 and expenditures of $303,681 and a cash balance of $115,491.

In contrast, his GOP opponent, Lee Thompson, reported receiving $22,216 during the latest reporting period and spending $19,785. Thompson's report showed receipts for the year of $102,698, expenses of $101,539 and a cash balance of $10,345, but a debt of $500.

Since the reporting period, Thompson reported a $5,000 donation from the National Republican Congressional Committee in Washington.

The congressional candidates are required to report any contribution of $1,000 or more within 48 hours of receipt to the Federal Election Commission during the final 20 days before the election. They do not have to file any more reports on total receipts and expenditures until Dec. 1.

In the 2nd District, incumbent Democrat Slattery showed receipts of $71,137 and expenses of $38,243 in the Oct. 1-19 reporting period. He also showed contributions this year of $229,201 and expenditures of $246,576 for a cash balance of $66,265 and no debts or loans.

That compared with Republican challenger Phil Meinhardt's reported receipts for this period of $4,585 and expenses of $4,948. Meinhardt's report showed receipts for the year of $47,254 and expenditures of $63,991. The GOP challenger to Slattery showed a cash balance of $2,822 but debts totaling $22,667.

tion of the greenhouses, which is expected to start in 1989.

Cool said negotiations are in progress with an architectural firm.

"We would like to speed up the process so we can build this ahead of schedule," he said.

Besides the addition to Throckmorton, Calvin is expected to undergo a complete renovation by 1995. Calvin has never had any major renovations besides removing or adding a wall to form a new classroom.

Randolph Pohlman, dean of the College of Business Administration, said increasing enrollment has created a pressing need for better facilities.

Other areas of Calvin appear to be crumbling. The plaster on the walls is falling off, and in some areas the paint has been chipped for several semesters.

"This place is depressing for people to work here," Pohlman said, describing the dilapidated walls and stairs.

Calvin is in line for a $7.7 million face-lift, he said, adding that it will be remodeled from the "mud" up to the ceiling.

media coverage was solely a media effort and was not sponsored by the Democratic Party, Carter said.

"The news media like to be on the bandwagon of the person who will win. If someone goes down in the polls, the news media pile on that person with very negative reporting," Carter said.

Americans were sympathetic with Quayle because of the intensely negative media coverage.

The same thing happened when Dukakis' patriotism was questioned when the media reported he hade vetoed a Massachusetts bill requiring public-school students to recite the Pledge of Allegiance and Dukakis' patriotism was questioned. Carter, calling himself patriotic, said he supported Dukakis' veto.

Attacks on the moral character of political leaders "have been very effective but have alienated the public," he said.

Reponding to questions from the audience, Carter's comments turned to current political issues, including the Strategic Defense Initiative.

Carter said he hoped relations with Moscow continue, saying SDI is the biggest stumbling block to the continued pursuance of guaranteed peace.

LET'S MAKE THE RECORD CLEAR . . .

ON WASHBURN.

•RHETORIC VS. REALITY. Joe Knopp does not support making Washburn a member of the Board of Regents.

Some suggest that votes to reduce duplication of programs by giving the regents authority over programs offered at community colleges and Washburn was a vote to make them " regents schools" . . . nothing could be further from the truth . . . coordination—yes . . . regents schools with full funding? NO.

•THE FUTURE: With the strongest push for Washburn in years, we need strong leadership to withstand the pressure. Joe Knopp's been there. He is more than just one vote . . . he can stand up to the pressure and will work to persuade his collegues to join him.

•THE DIFFERENCE: A Representative from Manhattan who has earned the respect of his collegues vs. a freshman who has never cast a public vote in any elected office.

•THE CHOICE: Experienced and respected representation . . . or untested rhetoric.

OSU heading for Miami through K-State

K-State Wildcats vs. OSU Cowboys

Game Time: 1:30 p.m. Saturday.
Place: KSU Stadium (42,000).
TV: None. Radio: Wildcat Radio Network (KMAN 1350 AM).
Series Record: Oklahoma State leads 30-12.
Notes: It's Parents' Day in Manhattan ... Oklahoma State tailback Barry Sanders has rushed for 100 yards in his last eight regular-season games ... Since winning 21-20 in 1983, K-State has scored just 19 points against the Cowboys the past four years ... Saturday is Wildcat running back Tom Dillon's 23rd birthday ... this is K-State's third game this season against a team from Oklahoma.

File/Gary Lytle

Oklahoma State's junior tailback Barry Sanders leads the nation in rushing with an average of 192.67 yards per game. Sanders, from Wichita, is first in the Big Eight Conference in kickoff returns and second in total offense behind Cowboys' quarterback Mike Gundy.

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

Though K-State and the Orange Bowl are miles apart, Oklahoma State coach Pat Jones said, "The road to Miami leads through Manhattan."

While the Cowboys' record and their No. 15 national ranking might lend itself to OSU overlooking the Wildcats, Jones won't have any of that kind of talk.

"We know that in order to achieve our goal and win the Big Eight championship and go to the Orange Bowl, we have to win this game," Jones said.

"I've reminded my squad that (the Wildcats) beat us ... in 1983 and we probably had a better squad defensively that year. If a team has a heartbeat, you have to respect them and be wary of them. That is the stance that we are going to take going into this game," he said.

While Jones dreams of playing on New Year's Day, K-State coach Stan Parrish is simply looking for improved play from his squad.

"(Oklahoma State) is a fine team. They have some of the best-talented skill people in this conference. I'm sure that they will be very tough," Parrish said. "I just want us to do our best. If we can give the same effort that we gave last week or better, I will be pleased."

The 'Cats are coming off one of what Parrish called "one of their most spirited outings of the season," a 48-3 loss to Nebraska. Oklahoma State, meanwhile, had an impressive 49-21 win over Missouri.

"We've had a good week in practice," Parrish said. "It has been pretty windy, so we've had a difficult time throwing the ball. We have most of our wounded back."

K-State is banged up after playing Oklahoma and the Cornhuskers on consecutive Saturdays. Defensive tackle Jim Oehm is out with a sprained ankle, and noseguard Rob Goode is out for the second straight game with a pinched shoulder nerve. Quarterback Paul Watson will miss his third straight game after suffering a bruised shoulder Oct. 8 against Missouri.

"We weren't able to practice in pads again this week until Wednesday. It never really helps our situation, but it was a necessity and our only option. We can't afford to lose any more bodies in practice," Parrish said.

K-State will need its defense primed and ready for Oklahoma State's triple-threat offense, which leads the nation in scoring with an average of 48.7 points per game.

The passing of the Big Eight Conference's top-rated quarterback Mike Gundy, the receiving of Hart Lee Dykes and the rushing of Barry Sanders (who leads the nation with 193 yards per game) can send defenses reeling.

"We aren't going to do anything special against Sanders," said Parrish of the 5-foot-8, 195-pound junior tailback from Wichita. "They have got too many good players for us to focus on any one player. If we focus on Sanders, Gundy does the damage. If we focus on Dykes, one of the other two can hurt us.

"We are just going to play our package and try to be sound. We are going to have to play hard and not give up the big play."

K-State's offense could also have trouble with Oklahoma State's defensive unit, which is coming off its best performance of the season. The Cowboys allowed Missouri only 279 yards of total offense. On the year, OSU has allowed an average of 438 yards per game — 234 yards rushing and 204 yards passing — 93 yards less than the K-State defense allows.

While most people familiar with the Wildcats know the accomplishments of K-State place-kicker Mark Porter, Jones is impressed with a kicker of his own.

Sophomore Cary Blanchard, who also punts, kicked three field goals against Missouri. His longest, 52-yards, was his career best.

"This is the best kicking we've had in a while," Jones said. "I think Blanchard is the best kicker in the league. He got a roll on one of his punts (against Missouri last Saturday), but he's doing a good job there too."

'Cat cross country teams preparing for conference's meet in Stillwater

By Chris Hays
Sports Writer

Another two-week layoff should help K-State's cross country teams at Saturday's Big Eight Conference championships in Stillwater, Okla.

"Oh, definitely," Wildcat coach John Capriotti said. "It gives us time to train and that's important. Plus, a race can really drain a person emotionally, so it is an advantage."

The K-State men are expected to fight for fourth place with host Oklahoma State this weekend. Iowa State, Nebraska and Colorado will probably jockey for the top three spots, as the three are ranked in the Top 20.

K-State is led by Pat Hessini. The junior has been the top Wildcat finisher in all of K-State's first three meets. After Hessini, the order of finish for K-State at the Cal Poly Invitational, Oct. 15, was David Keller, David Warders, Jan Jonsson, Rob Hays and Ron Smith. Of the runners traveling to Stillwater, Brian Zwahlen also competed at Cal Poly, but did not finish.

"It will be a big advantage for Oklahoma State, running on its own course, so it will be a tough race for us," Capriotti said. "We need a total team effort — one through seven — in order to finish in the top half of the conference."

Capriotti was somewhat displeased with the teams' finishes at Cal Poly. The men finished third, while the women took fifth. Nebraska was the only other Big Eight team at Cal Poly and the 'Huskers defeated K-State in both divisions. Capriotti said both teams can run a lot better.

"At Cal Poly, we were just so-so. We have to run better in order to finish higher than fourth place this weekend," Capriotti said. "And it's not like if we run better, we still won't finish any higher than fourth place, because we're a much better team than that."

The women's squad surprisingly finds itself looking for depth from its veteran runners because two of the top three runners are freshmen.

Staff/Jeff Stead

Junior Pat Hessini and freshman Ron Smith are two members of the men's cross country team who will compete in the conference meet Saturday. Hessini has been the team's top runner all season.

Although that pleases Capriotti, he would still like to see his experienced runners among the leaders.

"Our back four girls have the ability to run within 15 to 20 seconds of our top three, and we need that from them," Capriotti said. "I'm still waiting for Becky Ives and Marge Eddy to make a move because I know they're capable of it."

The women are led by freshman Janet Haskin, who has finished first, second and third in her first three collegiate meets. "Janet Haskin will be right up there somewhere. I look for her to be in the top five," Capriotti said.

Right behind Haskin is junior Angie Barry, the most experienced runner on the squad. Capriotti said Barry is starting to run "right with Haskin" in practice.

"Angie has been training really well and I look for her and also Janet Treiber to finish in the top ten, if they run well," he said.

Treiber is the other freshman among the top three K-State run-

Athletic director announces hiring of administrators

By Staff and Wire Reports

K-State athletic director Steve Miller announced Wednesday and Thursday the addition of two people to the Wildcat athletic administrative staff.

Topeka attorney Jeff Schemmel has been named assistant athletic director for development in the Kansas State University Athletic Department.

The addition of Schemmel "is the final piece of the athletic administrative puzzle," Miller said.

"Jeff brings multiple talents to our administrative organizations," Miller said. "His unique understanding of the broad-based supporters of Kansas State will be vital to our fund-raising success. His experience as a lawyer will provide us with another expert for internal and external affairs."

Schemmel, 34, graduated from K-State in 1976 with a degree in political science. He said he was looking forward to entering the field of athletic administration.

"Anybody that knows me very well knows that I've always wanted to use my skills in the athletic field," Schemmel said. "I was excited that the opportunity presented itself at my alma mater. I am very indebted to Kansas State and can't think of a better college to work for."

Schemmel said he is excited about the direction of the athletic department.

"Steve Miller is a very dynamic individual who is taking K-State in the right direction."

While at K-State, Schemmel ran on the track and cross country teams, achieving All-American honors in 1975. He anchored the 1975 medley relay team which won the NCAA title, and he was 1976 NCAA runner-up in the 1,500-meter run. He still holds the K-State record for the mile (4:02.42), and has the third-fastest 1,500-meter time in school history (3:42.0), the eighth-fastest 5,000-meter run (14:08.9) and was a member of the the third-, fourth- and fifth-fastest distance medley teams.

Schemmel received the Big Eight Conference medallion as K-State's outstanding student athlete for the 1975-76 school year. That same year, he was voted the most inspirational athlete for the the men's track team.

A native of Madison, South Dakota, Schemmel received his law degree from Washburn University in 1979. He is presently in partnership with the Irwin, Clutter, Severson and Schemmel firm in Topeka. He is in his ninth year of practice, specializing in business and sports law.

Schemmel will join the Wildcat staff Monday.

Also joining the staff is K-State alumnus Dr. R. L. (Bob) Merten as administrative assistant in charge of special events. Miller made the announcement Thursday afternoon.

"(These additions are) the final pieces of the athletic administrative puzzle."
—Steve Miller athletic director

Merten, a basketball letter-winner in 1956 and 1957, was co-founder of the Wildcat Legends, a club of Kansas State basketball lettermen, and serves as its president.

"Bob Merten provides community service, past participation as a varsity basketball player and keen interest in Kansas State University's development as an academic institution and an athletic entity," Miller said.

Merten previously had been a dental specialist in Manhattan, and had been appointed as a consultant and advisory committee member for Blue Cross/Blue Shield, and as a consultant to three retirement communities in Manhattan.

For 21 years, Merten served in the U.S. Army as a consultant and supervisor, and achieved the rank of colonel. He was team dentist for the Kansas City Chiefs football team in 1963 and 1964.

Merten is already in his KSU position, and his office is in Bramlage Coliseum.

Army strives for 10-1 campaign

By The Associated Press

"Thou shall not pass" could be Army's motto this season.

Since Coach Jim Young installed the wishbone offense in 1984, the Cadets are 22-0 when they throw six passes or less, 31-4 when they throw nine times or less. When they put the ball in the air more than nine times, their record is a sorry 3-14-1.

To paraphrase an old gag, Army is first in war, first in peace and last among the nation's 104 Division I-A teams in passing offense. In seven games, of which they have won six, the Cadets have thrown just 39 passes and completed 16 for an average of 56 yards a game. But they are third in rushing with a 377-yard average.

College Football Focus

Rutgers, which beat Michigan State and Penn State, was Army's latest victim, falling 34-24 last Saturday. With Air Force, Vanderbilt, Boston College and Navy left, a 10-1 season is certainly possible.

"Army has a certain element of discipline simply by the nature of their institution," Rutgers coach Dick Anderson said.

"The wishbone, I think, is tailored to their temper, tailored to their institution, because it involves an extreme amount of discipline. I think they play it exceptionally well.

"They're not very big up front offensively or defensively, and yet they come after you very tough, very tough."

Coach Bob Ricca of St. John's (N.Y.) University has seen both sides of the NCAA's new conversion rule which allows the defensive team to score two points.

ners. She finished 20th at Cal Poly. Treiber was followed by Jenny Faunce, Ives, Eddy and Jennifer Hillier.

"I think our girls were a little bit overwhelmed at the Cal Poly meet, and I don't understand that, because most all of them have run at nationals," Capriotti said. "We're better than we were last year and we got third (in the Big Eight) and went to nationals."

The women's crown will probably go to either Nebraska or Oklahoma State, ranked 10th and 11th in the nation, respectively. It should be a dogfight between K-State, Iowa State, Missouri and Colorado for the next four spots.

"It looks like both of our teams are right in the middle right now," Capriotti said. "But if we should finish there, I won't be thrilled. We can do better than fourth or fifth."

Lansing prisoner flees after recent transfer

By The Associated Press

LANSING — Delphie D. Patten, 26, was discovered missing from the Kansas Correctional Institution at Lansing early Thursday. He was sent to prison in 1980 on a Reno County conviction for aggravated sodomy and burglary, and was transferred this month to KCIL, which has minimum security facilities for male prisoners and maximum security for women.

John Callison, deputy director, said that he was discovered missing about 1:45 a.m. from his quarters on the second floor of the male living unit. He said Patten apparently broke a screen door to a porch balcony, then went down a drain pipe and threw a blanket over the razor wire atop a 12-foot fence before climbing over to freedom.

Officials from the institution and the nearby Kansas State Pentientiary established check points in the area surrounding the two prisons, but they were taken down after dawn because the escapee had apparently gotten away from the immediate vicinity.

Patten, one of 137 inmates at KCIL, is described as white, approximately 5-foot-10 and 136 pounds, with blue eyes and long blondish hair sometimes worn in a ponytail. Callison said he has numerous tatoos on his arms.

Controversial artist to perform

By Brad Atchison
Collegian Reviewer

Saturday's concert will mark the third time comedian/singer/songwriter Dave Lippman has brought his show to Manhattan. Once in the fall of 1987 and again in the spring of 1988, Lippman and his "arch-nemesis" George Schrub, performed for very enthusiastic Manhattan audiences.

Lippman will perform at 8 p.m. Saturday at the United Christian Ministry, 1021 Denison Ave. Tickets for the show are $5.

Lippman is a critically acclaimed artist. He blends dry comedic wit with strong acoustic rhythms to present an early Smothers Brothers-style social commentary. Lippman's work has won him rave rewiews from the likes of the Village Voice and the Cincinnati Entertainer.

However, it would be a misrepresentation to bill Lippman as a less-than-controversial performing artist. Lippman uses his comedy and song with the intention of making people think.

Lippman's Saturday performance is being sponsored by Students for Educational Awareness.

"One of the goals of SEA is to make students aware that we are not going to school in ivory towers," said Paige Nichols, senior in philosophy and SEA coordinator. "We want to make students aware of how our University affects the world, and vice versa. Lippman reaffirms this need in his show."

Although Lippman's show is based in the world of politics, it thrives in the world of entertainment. Lippman's 1987 album "Shoot From the Lipp," has received national and international airplay, as well as being featured on KSDB's own "Politirock," a weekly political music show.

After considering Lippman's growing reputation, some might ask why he has made Manhattan a regular tour stop.

"Dave feels the same way others feel when they come to Manhattan and find a group such as SEA," Nichols said. "They are pleasantly suprised. From here Lippman can go up to Omaha and say 'I just did a great show in Kansas, and they really give a damn.'"

Many of the people in Saturday's audience are likely to be Manhattan's version of Dave Lippman groupies.

Junior honorary organizing Parents Weekend activities

By Theresa Luling
Collegian Reporter

It has been said that variety is the spice of life, and that is exactly what the Chimes Junior Honorary is offering K-Staters and their parents during Parents Weekend '88.

As sponsors for the event, members of Chimes started working on the schedule of activities last spring.

"Publicity (committee) works the hardest during the spring and summer getting specific activities planned and the artwork completed," said Karin Bangle, junior in industrial engineering and member of Chimes. "We finalized details when we came back to school this fall."

The weekend gets under way tonight with a Wildcat Chuck Wagon Buffet in the Union Stateroom. This is followed by the Coors Light Comedy Commandos, featuring comedians David Naster and Romie Angelich at 8 in McCain Auditorium. Tickets for the show are $2 at the door or at the McCain box office.

For those looking for an alternative form of entertainment, "Bull Durham" will be showing tonight and Saturday night in Forum Hall. Tickets for the R-rated movie are $1.75.

Activities Saturday include numerous receptions at the residence halls and greek houses, campus tours and a concert.

Campus walking tours will originate in the Union between 9:30 and 11 a.m. A variety of entertainment will be provided by student groups during the morning in the Union courtyard. The Union art gallery will display works by Emily Martin titled "Mixed Media on Rice Paper." Other exhibits, spotlighting works by K-State seniors in fine arts, will be displayed in the McCain galleries and Gallery Six of the Art Building.

The kickoff of the K-State vs. Oklahoma State University football game is 1:30 p.m. in KSU Stadium. John and Connie Sullivan of Manhattan will be honored as the 1988 Honorary Parents during the game's half-time program. Their daughter Dana, a senior in elementary education, nominated her parents for the award and won the honorary parents essay writing contest sponsored by Chimes.

"I was surprised when I found out my parents had won," Sullivan said.

Honored parents were selected by a committee of students, faculty and administrators.

A concert is planned for 8 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium by the Men and Women's glee clubs and the K-State Singers.

Lawmakers keep money

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The 58 House members facing no major party challenge to re-election have raised $14.4 million for their campaigns, and nearly half of them will be entitled to keep any unspent money when they retire, a private study said Friday.

The list includes such House leadership figures as Speaker Jim Wright, D-Texas, and Reps. Claude Pepper, D-Fla., chairman of the Rules Committee; John Dingell, D-Mich., chairman of the Energy and Commerce Committee, and Kika de la Garza, D-Texas, chairman of the Agriculture Committee.

Forty-one of the 58 unopposed lawmakers are Democrats, who control the House, according to the study compiled by the watchdog group Congress Watch. The $14.4 million includes $7.3 million from political action committees.

That these PACs feel compelled to contribute to lawmakers who have no opponent shows that what's being sought is access and influence, not compatible candidates or good government," said Joan Claybrook, president of Public Citizen, the parent organization of Congress Watch.

The legislators or their aides who were questioned defended the fund raising, arguing that campaign funds must be collected before they know whether they will have an election opponent.

"If you had a crystal ball, you wouldn't enter into one of these fund-raising strategies," said Cliff Gibbons, who is campaign finance manager for his father, Rep. Sam Gibbons, D-Fla.

Congress Watch said the elder Gibbons has raised $309,537 from PACs, second highest total among the unopposed incumbents, and $503,340 overall, the third highest mark after Rep. Martin Frost, D-Texas, and Dingell. Gibbons is chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee subcommittee on trade.

PAC are formed by corporations, labor unions and other interest groups to funnel money to candidates, with incumbents the long-favored recipients. For the 1986 elections, according to Federal Election Commission records, PACs sent 88 percent of their contributions to lawmakers seeking re-election.

Congress Watch found that from Jan. 1, 1987, through Sept. 30, 1988, 31 of the 58 incumbents with no primary or major party general election opponents raised more than $100,000 from PACs. Of these, 11 raked in more than $200,000 and three pocketed more than $300,000.

During the same period, 19 unopposed incumbents raised more than $300,000 from PACs and individuals combined. Of these, nine collected more than $400,000 and three received more than $500,000.

Frost, whose $524,000 in PAC and individual contributions was tops on the list, said he had raised most of his money last year before he knew he would be unopposed.

Asked if compiling such a formidable campaign warchest could serve to scare off oppnents, he said, "It hasn't in the past." Frost, first elected in 1978 and a member of the House Rules and Budget committees, has always had opponents before.

Hundreds of gravestones mark the Post Cemetery at Fort Riley, established in 1853. The cemetery is the resting place of veterans, soldiers and their families.

The Old Dutch Mill was built 12 miles north of Wamego in 1879, but now stands in the town's City Park. Recent renovations allow the mill to grind flour as in the past.

When you have to get away...

Road Trips

The leaves are changing colors.

The air is clean and crisp.

It's the weekend and sitting in your room studying or watching television is the farthest thing from your mind.

So why not grab a friend and your car keys and take a road trip to some of the more interesting spots in Kansas?

For the outdoorsman, Tuttle Creek Dam and Reservoir provide many opportunities.

Tuttle Creek is the second-largest lake in Kansas and is just five miles north of Manhattan. Even though it is not quite water-skiing weather, there are still many things to do.

Numerous public sites surrounding the lake are available for fishing, boating, hunting, camping or just quiet picnicking.

Permits are required and user fees are charged in certain areas.

For a touch of the Old West, Fort Riley, founded in 1853, is eight miles west of Manhattan.

Many points of interest on the post are open to the public: the U.S. Cavalry Museum, Custer's home, Kansas' First Territorial Capitol Building, and the Old Trooper Monument.

Tours are conducted through many of these sites and a special "Story Time" is offered to youngsters at the Custer House.

If presidential history is more to your liking, Abilene is the place to go.

Information about the life of Dwight D. Eisenhower, from his childhood through his term as president, can be found at the Eisenhower Center on southeast Fourth Street in Abilene.

The attraction consists of Dwight D. Eisenhower's boyhood home, a museum highlighting his career in the military and the presidency, a library housing the archives of his administration, and the Place of Meditation — the final resting place of Dwight and Mamie Eisenhower.

Guided tours are available for 75 cents and last about two hours.

The evolution of agriculture can be traced at The Agricultural Hall of Fame, 630 North 126th St. in Bonner Springs.

The hall honors individuals who have contributed to the success of American agriculture.

Visitors can enjoy the hall from March through December. Cost is $2.

Sports fans can get their fill at the Kansas All-Sports Hall of Fame, 11th and Massachusetts in Lawrence.

Visitors can view memorabilia, accompanied by tapes and figures, of 51 outstanding Kansas sports figures.

Athletes and spectators can enjoy this attraction all year, except on major holidays.

How many Indians in Kansas stood 6 feet tall?

Tourists who are interested in such facts may wish to visit the Indian Burial Pit, 29 Crestview St. in Salina.

The prehistoric burial pit contains skeletal remains of more than 140 Indians 6 feet tall or taller.

A structure covering the pit contains an extensive collection of Indian artifacts.

Admission is $1.50 for adults and 75 cents for children. Guided tours are available and last 30 minutes.

The burial pit is open all year.

In its early days, The Hays House distributed mail, U.S. Government court hearings, theater productions, church and newspaper printing.

Today, visitors can eat meals ranging from baked chicken to steak at the Hays House Restaurant.

The Hays House, a restaurant since 1857, is at 112 W. Main St. in Council Grove and is open all year, except for Christmas and New Year's Day.

The Old Dutch Mill in Wamego offers an interesting trip that won't take all day.

Built of native stone in 1879, the mill was originally 12 miles north of Wamego and is now in the town's City Park.

Recent renovations have enabled the mill to grind wheat flour.

Since July, visitors have been able to purchase this flour.

Memorabilia of Kansas history is abundant at the Kansas State Capitol Building.

Established in 1903, the State Capitol is at 10th and Harrison in Topeka.

The Lincoln Statue and the Pioneer Woman Statue stand on the 20-acre grounds. The Old Cottonwood Tree, southeast of the Capitol, is a representative of the official state tree.

Guided tours, which last about one hour, are offered all year, except on Thanksgiving and Christmas.

In the past, the only place one could view the F-11 Grumman Tigercat, F-84 jet, C-47 and DeHaviland Beaver may have been on the battlefield.

Civilians today are able to see such memorabilia at The Combat Air Museum, which is at Forbes Field in Topeka.

A collection of World War II Allied and enemy combat aircraft are featured at Forbes Field.

World War II history buffs can enjoy these exhibits from March through November. Visitors may browse, although guided tours are available.

The largest waterfall in Kansas is at the Zoological Park-Rain Forest, 635 Gage Blvd. in Topeka.

The zoo is home to more than 400 animals. A tropical rain forest at the zoo features lush vegetation and various species of birds. A replica of a 19th century Santa Fe train traverses the park.

The Midwest's largest site of Indian artifacts and remains is in Salina. The 140 skeletal remains at the Indian Burial Pit are all from people 6 feet tall or taller and date back 750 years.

Women find home businesses challenging, versatile

By Stephanie Morrill
Collegian Reporter

Imagine having a job in which you could set your own hours and have an earning potential where the sky is the limit.

This philosophy is one that motivates many area women to start businesses out of their own homes, and many K-State students to pick up part-time jobs as representatives for various home-based companies.

Floris Taylor of Manhattan has been selling Mary Kay products for eight years.

"I started using the products many years ago with my daughter, so when she started selling the products she tried to talk me into it, too," she said.

"Unfortunately, I loved the products but hated the idea of selling, so I decided to try it for six months and I've been selling ever since," Taylor said.

"I really love my job," she said.

The Mary Kay philosophy is that God comes first in one's life, family is second, and career is third.

"We feel that in order to have success in any part of your life, you need to set priorities," she said. "Our philosophy demonstrates this."

"I like the attitudes of the other representatives, and I make a lot of friends through my job," Taylor said.

There are more than 200 Mary Kay representatives in the United States.

The first position on the Mary Kay management ladder is VIP Consultant. Each woman begins as a beauty consultant demonstrating her potential for career growth through personal sales, recruiting and leadership.

The next step is sales director. Each sales director receives compensation from the company for outstanding unit sales and commissions for training and educating individual unit members.

The sales director may also receive additional unit and recruiting bonuses and benefits, such as the famous pink Cadillac.

"The amount of money you make really depends on how much work you want to put into it, just like anything else," Taylor said. "I don't know of any other individually-based company that has such a great earning potential," she said.

The Herbal Weight Control Program is another home-based business, with more than 200,000 distributors around the world.

Four years ago, Arlyss Haggdorn met a woman who had recently lost 76 pounds on the program. "After learning that, I knew it had to work, and I began selling," she said.

The program is a nutritional plan designed to help individuals gain, lose, or maintain present weight.

The Herbal Weight Control Program can be found not only in the United States, but in various other countries, such as Canada, Mexico, Australia, and the United Kingdom. "In fact, we are getting ready to expand into several other countries quite soon," Haggdorn said.

Mark Hughes began the program in 1980, and it has grown incredibly over the past eight years, Haggdorn said.

The program begins with the 1-2-3-4 product, which is a protein drink consumed twice a day in place of regular meals. The third meal of the day consists of healthy foods, but not strictly "diet foods," she said.

"The main reason I chose to become a representative is because of the convenience. I can work on my own, and it keeps the overhead down," she said.

The first step in becoming a representative for the Herbal Weight Control Program is to sign up as a distributor and sell the products at a discount to three individuals.

"We ship a lot of our products, because many of our customers move and still wish to purchase our products," Haggdorn said.

"I really enjoy my work, I really haven't had any problems with it," Haggdorn said.

Judy Weaver is a relatively new representative of Watkins Home Products. The company sells various home products such as spices, dessert items and double-strength vanilla, which is the most popular item.

Watkins Famous Home Products was originally organized 120 years ago in Minnesota.

"I began my business mainly because I have three small children, and I needed to set my own schedule," Weaver said. "It's convenient."

2 whales free, still in channel

By The Associated Press

BARROW, Alaska — Two whales freed from a tiny breathing hole in the Arctic ice by Eskimos using chain saws and Soviet icebreakers made progress Thursday but were still in the channel the ships created.

"I thought they'd be gone (to the open sea) by now," said Ron Morris, coordinator of the massive effort to free the leviathans. "I want them gone."

Morris, who made an observation flight over the whales during the morning, said the California gray whales were 1½ miles seaward from the point at which they were last observed Wednesday night.

Eskimos with chain saws had cut a series of breathing holes that allowed the whales to swim well away from the original hole to which they had been confined.

The whales grew accustomed to the cutting and during a frenzy of work Wednesday, in which 50 new holes were cut, the whales repeatedly surfaced in the new holes before the last block of ice was removed.

The Eskimos eventually worked the marine mammals to within a quarter-mile of a channel carved through the 18-inch-thick ice by two Soviet icebreakers late Tuesday and early Wednesday. Then the icebreaker Vladimir Arseniev reopened the partially frozen channel.

The man-made channel, aimed at guiding the whales to an natural open "lead" through the ice and eventually to open water, partially refroze during the night, Morris said.

He said the whales were "conditioning themselves back to reality" after nearly three weeks of confinement in the ice off the coast.

Ag college to award outstanding alumnus

By Becky Jones
Collegian Reporter

The first College of Agriculture Distinguished Alumni Award will be presented at the annual Ag Alumni Round Up Saturday.

The roundup will be at the Brandeberry Indoor Complex, located south of KSU Stadium.

Bill Amstein, ag alumni and development coordinator, said the first alumni award will be given to a "true producer" of agriculture, although any person who graduated from the College of Agriculture prior to 1973 is eligible. The college is planning to give a distinguished alumni award annually.

Amstein said he expects faculty members and graduates working in agriculture-related fields to win the award in the future.

"This is just the first (award) of many to follow," he said.

Criteria for the award include outstanding career accomplishments, contributions to community, state and nation and humanitarian service to society. Service to K-State and the College of Agriculture is also considered, but is not mandatory.

The alumni award will be presented during Saturday's program, which begins at 11:15 a.m. The program will also feature Walter Woods, dean of the College of Agriculture, and the new officers, directors and student scholarship winners of the Ag Alumni Association. Also, Athletic Director Steve Miller and mens' basketball coach Lon Kruger are expected to speak.

Amstein said he is expecting about 250 alumni to attend the roundup, most of them from Kansas. Although the event is geared mainly toward alumni, students are also welcome, he said.

The Ag Alumni Association was formed in the spring of 1979, and meets three or four times a year, Amstein said. The group has about 14,000 members; 7,000 in Kansas and 7,000 in other states.

The group sponsors numerous events each year, raises money for scholarships for students in the College of Agriculture and encourages prospective students to attend K-State, Amstein said.

Ag Careers Day will also be from 9 a.m. to noon Saturday in conjunction with the roundup. High-school students will visit with K-State students and faculty in the College of Agriculture and attend an informational program about careers.

Anderson marks fourth birthday since taken captive

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Thursday was Terry Anderson's 41st birthday, his fourth in captivity, and his captors released an old photograph of the American journalist to support a statement denying links to a woman arrested in Italy.

A statement delivered with it to a Western news agency said a photo of Anderson found in the possession of Aline Ibrahim Rizkallah, arrested in Milan last week, was a reverse print of one originally released Aug. 2, 1987.

Islamic Jihad, which means Islamic Holy War, claims responsibility for kidnapping Anderson, the chief Middle East correspondent of The Associated Press.

The Beirut staff observed the birthday in his office, which they call "Terry's room." No changes have been made in it since his abduction in west Beirut on March 16, 1985, other than displaying the 13 photographs of him released by the kidnappers.

Staff members sang "Happy Birthday, Dear Terry" and blew out the candles on a chocolate cake.

Lebanese state television said it would show a tape later Thursday of Anderson's 3-year-old daughter, Sulome, who was born after he was kidnapped. His other daughter, Gabrielle, was 10 at the time.

In Cadiz, Ky., Anderson's sister, Peggy Say, expressed hope for his release on or before U.S. election day Nov. 8.

He has been held longest of 14 foreigners still missing in Lebanon. Most or all the captives, who include nine Americans, are believed to be in the hands of radical Shiite Moslems loyal to Iran.

Italian police have said the photographs found in the woman's luggage were reproductions. They were of Anderson, American hostage Alann Steen and a man who was not identified.

In Thursday's 22-line statement, typewritten in Arabic, Islamic Jihad said: "A negative of the picture was taken. A photograph was printed in a reverse manner."

Accompanying the statement were a copy of the Anderson photograph and a reverse reproduction of it. The reverse print appeared identical to the one found in Rizkallah's possession.

Also in the envelope were photocopies of the original picture as printed in the leftist Beirut daily As-Safir the day after its first release last year, and of the reproduction carried by Rizkallah, as published by Beirut newspapers.

In the original, Anderson was looking directly into the camera with his head inclined slightly to the right. In the reproduction, his head tilts to the left.

The spiritual head of Lebanon's Sunni Moslem community, Grand Mufti Sheik Hassan Khaled, expressed "regret over Mr. Anderson's continued captivity for such a long period."

Lebanon's Sunni community has not been involved in taking hostages.

Housing heads propose hike

By Heather Huntington
Collegian Reporter

K-State Department of Housing officials have proposed a 7.6 percent hike in room and board rates for campus residence halls and off-campus cooperative houses. The increase would be effective in the fall of 1989.

The rising cost of food and increases in employee salaries are the major reasons for the proposed increase, said Thomas Frith, director of housing.

There is expected to be a 10 percent increase in the cost of food. This increase would result in an extra $2.5 million added to the food budget, Frith said.

The increase in housing costs could result in a raise for many housing employees.

Under the new policy, 250 permanent custodial and food service workers would receive a 7 percent raise, Frith said.

"They're generally not well paid, and they should be because they are well skilled," he said.

In addition to the raise for permanent employees, student workers, office employees and maintenance staff workers would also experience a 5 percent salary hike, Frith said.

These cost increases would cause the residence hall rates to rise to $1,130 a semester, he said.

University housing rates were increased 2 percent in 1986 and 4 percent this fall. There was no increase in fall 1987, said Larry Reno, the housing department's fiscal officer.

"I think we might lose some people if it keeps going up," said Elizabeth Cruthers, president of Ford Hall.

"It will be harder for people with lower incomes to afford the dorms," she said.

The cost of living at Jardine Terrace apartments, which are exclusively for married couples, families and single parents, would rise from $156 to $166 a month for unfurnished one-bedroom apartments, said Susanne Tunstall, family housing coordinator.

"This will be the second time in

Drug testing bill will affect 2,300

By Becky Jones
Collegian Reporter

A new program testing state employees for illegal drug use will go into effect Tuesday as part of Gov. Mike Hayden's effort to create a drug-free Kansas.

The program, passed by the 1988 Legislature, will require drug screening for all applicants for safety-sensitive positions and for current employees under suspicion of illicit drug use.

Galon Davis, Hayden's special assistant on drug abuse, said people in safety-sensitive positions include state law enforcement officers who carry firearms and officers assigned to the state's corrections program, such as prison guards.

The program will affect 19 state agencies and more than 2,300 employees in safety-sensitive positions, Davis said.

Applicants for safety-sensitive positions who test positive will not be offered the job, said Bill Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Services. Current employees will only be tested if a supervisor has a "reasonable suspicion" that a drug problem exists, Arck said.

"This deals almost exclusively with employee job performance," he said.

The goal of the program, Davis said, is to be rehabilitation-oriented, as opposed to punishment. Employees who test positive will be referred to the LIFEline Employee Assistance Program. They will then meet with a counselor to assess the level of the Drunk sinner lends name to pumpkins

By Scott Berg
Collegian Reporter

Smiling, frowning, sad, demented, funny, horrible and adorable faces carved into pumpkins have traditionally greeted wary trick-or-treaters on Halloween.

The origin of the jack-o'-lantern started hundreds of years ago in Ireland from a tale of a drunk sinner named Jack. He never did well to anyone or anything, said Thomas Murray, who studies cultural holidays and is an assistant professor of English.

The jack-o'-lantern legend goes something like this:

When Jack became ill and near death, Satan decided to come and take his soul. Satan approached Jack and told him that his time had come.

Jack, being smart and not wanting to go to hell, tricked the devil into not bothering him for 10 years. He got the devil to change into a coin, which Jack then trapped in his coin purse.

The jack-o'-lanterns Stone and Hoppe carved sit on the front porch, ready to greet trick-or-treaters.

Ten years passed, and Satan appeared again. Jack again tricked him, this time by coaxing him into climbing an apple tree in whose trunk Jack then carved a cross. Jack

Candidates discuss safety, funding issues

By Nancy Prosser
Collegian Reporter

Union Program Council Issues and Ideas sponsored a student body presidential debate Sunday in the Union Courtyard to enable candidates to voice their opinions and answer questions regarding campus issues.

Nine of the 11 presidential candidates participated in the debate. After the candidates gave opening statements, they were divided into groups of three. Each group received a prepared question from a moderator.

The candidates responded individually to the question in alternating orders. At the end of the session, candidates gave closing comments. They then fielded questions from the crowd of about 35 people.

The first group of questions, which were issue-oriented, included such issues as the importance of a student health fee, the possible creation of an athletic fee and the future of Farrell Library.

J.D. Llewelyn, junior in business, discusses one of the topics asked of the nine candidates at the student body presidential debate Thursday night in the Union Courtyard.

When asked if an athletic fee would help or hinder attitudes on campus, J.D. Llewelyn, junior in business, said he believed there was a certain pride involved in attending a university with excellence in athletics.

Llewelyn said he supports taking the question to a student referendum. However, he said if students decide athletics are not a priority, then the student body president must stand behind that decision.

When asked the same question, Sally Howard-Clayton, senior in humanities, said she believes students would be paying for something not all of them want.

"I would vote no on a student athletic fee," she said.

Tom Jones, sophomore in political science, also expressed a negative opinion about an athletic fee.

"The athletic fee is probably a dumb idea," he said.

The second set of questions was designed to give the audience a broader understanding of what the candidates are like personally. Those questions included describing a typical K-Stater, stating in three words what K-State has to offer, and explaining where they would take a prospective student to best demonstrate university life.

When asked for his definition of a K-Stater, Mike Cormaci, senior in agricultural economics, said a K-Stater is a person who is highly motivated.

"Anyone who comes to an institute of higher learning like K-State is motivated to become the best person they can be," he said.

Scott King, senior in political science, said a K-Stater is someone who is proud of themselves and the people they're around.

"K-Staters have a sense of pride about them and in what they can accomplish," he said.

"A K-Stater has a vision of who they are and of what they can become," said Laurian Cuffy, senior in management, defining the K-Stater.

Candidates had different views about what they consider the most pressing problem facing K-Staters today.

King said applying for and receiving financial aid is the biggest problem. It could be a "more efficient process," he said.

Cormaci said the continual idea of initiating student fees is the most pressing issue. Also, he said there needs to be more student involvement as to how fees are spent.

Cuffy said the process of students getting involved needs strengthening. He also said senators need to be more accountable to students.

In closing comments, Phil Nordhus, senior in economics, expressed concern about the proposals that would increase student fees.

"I am not an advocate of going to the legislature with every issue, but I do feel that in some cases, the Kansas taxpayers deserve state funding," he said.

K-State must choose a student body president that will be the best representative, said Phil Kirk, senior in agricultural ecconomics, during his closing comments.

"K-State needs a student body president that will represent them to the administration, (Board of) regents, and Kansas Legislature."

John McIntyre, senior in industrial engineering, closed by saying that he believes this year's campaign is issue-oriented when it should be student-oriented.

In her closing statements, Howard-Clayton said she advocated a different representative system for the students and that she would work to create a more unified student body.

Bob Copple, graduate in industrial engineering, and Brenda Halinski, senior in elementary education, both candidates for student body president, were not at the debate.

K-Staters can vote for student body president, student senators and Board of Student Publication candidates with a picture identification and a fee card from 7:30 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. Tuesday and Wednesday in the Union, Cardwell Hall and Derby Food Center.

If none of the candidates for student body president receives a majority of the votes, there will be a run-off election Nov. 9.

13,000 married in ceremony

SEOUL, South Korea — More than 13,000 brides and grooms in the Unification Church were married Sunday in a mass wedding complete with matching bridal gowns and bouquets, a day after the couples were introduced.

The ceremony matched 6,516 couples, 4,000 of them Japanese marrying Japanese and the remainder marriages between people from the United States and more than a dozen other nations.

Many couples did not speak the same language.

The Rev. Sun Myung Moon, founder of the South Korean-based church, matched the couples personally, a church spokesman said, and purposely chose to unite more than 2,000 Japanese and Koreans "to heal and spiritually cleanse bad feelings left over from the Japanese colonial rule of Korea."

Moon told the newlyweds: "You will overcome international barriers to create one world of the heart and a blessed race for the future."

In unison, the grooms lifted the veils of the brides and the brides and grooms took identical gold rings from small silk pouches to place on each other's fingers.

There was no kiss. The couples are counseled to live together 40 days without sharing the same bed.

Yonhap, the South Korean news agency, reported that South Korean hotels were complaining they had no business from the wedding.

"The church feels a marriage is not just for personal physical satisfaction," explained Bernard Quandt, of Bad-Kreuznach, West Germany.

Charles criticizes buildings

LONDON — Prince Charles took on the architectural establishment in his own television documentary and gained a powerful vote of confidence from ordinary citizens, newspapers, and even some architects.

A newspaper survey showed that more than 75 percent of Britons agreed with the prince's views that many architects and developers ignore people's wishes and build ugly, characterless buildings that are unpleasant to live in.

However, Bill Rodgers, director general of the Royal Institute of British Architects, responded Sunday that "there is too much hypocrisy ... and we are not going to allow architects to be made scapegoats."

Charles' maiden venture into television writing and performing was an outspoken and often humorous look at modern architecture, which he has ridiculed for years. He has angered leading architects and raised complaints that a member of the royal family has no business publicizing such views.

With 75 minutes of uninterrupted television time on the British Broadcasting Corp. on Friday night, Charles took a more positive approach, showing viewers new buildings and developments he admired.

But his criticism of others was severe.

Glancing at a low, stark-white structure among Victorian buildings at the edge of the River Thames, Charles commented: "That's redolent of a word processor to me, and I don't see that people particularly want to live looking at a word processor."

BRIEFLY ACROSS THE NATION

Nuclear reactor shuts down

MIDDLETOWN, Pa. — The lone operating reactor at Three Mile Island made an unscheduled shutdown Sunday for reasons believed to be linked to the plant's non-nuclear turbine system, a spokesman said.

The Unit 1 reactor shut down automatically at 8:50 a.m., said Gordon Tomb, a spokesman for plant operator GPU Nuclear Corp.

Plant systems operated normally during the shutdown and no emergency condition existed, he said.

Plant and federal Nuclear Regulatory Commission officials checked the system to determine the cause of the shutdown. Tomb said the reactor would not go back on line until the investigation was complete.

The reactor had been operating at full power, generating about 880 megawatts of electricity, Tomb said.

Three Mile Island was the site of the nation's worst commercial nuclear accident on March 28, 1979, when equipment failures and human error led to a loss of coolant and partial core meltdown in the plant's Unit 2 reactor.

The NRC approved the restart of the undamaged Unit 1 reactor on May 30, 1985.

Children thank Gorbachev

LOVELAND, Colo. — The plight of whales trapped by Arctic Ocean ice got worldwide attention, and the part played in their rescue by two Soviet icebreakers got the special attention of members of a third grade class.

"I feel sorry for every living creature that has to go through this," said Lisa DeLack, a third-grader at Centennial Elementary School in Loveland.

Lisa convinced her teacher and school principal that the Soviets deserved some thanks for their help in freeing two California gray whales off the north coast of Alaska. A third whale disappeared and was presumed dead.

"I saw the whales and the Russians helping and I thought it was very nice of them to do it," Lisa said.

So she and her classmates penned their appreciation on blue-lined school paper, some illustrated with drawings of whales. Their letters were sealed in an envelope and mailed to Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev in Moscow.

"When someone came in and was willing to help our country, it made these kids feel real good about it," said Centennial principal Sam Simonetta.

Citizens fight 'Devil's Night'

DETROIT — An army of 20,000 citizen volunteers joined city employees Sunday in patrolling the streets to combat the outbreak of arson that has become traditional here on the night before Halloween, dubbed Devil's Night.

Elsewhere, fights broke out and beer cans flew during a two-day pre-Halloween festival in Carbondale, Ill., where police arrested nearly 200 people.

The volunteer force, including members of 46 citizens band radio clubs, block clubs and other organizations, was twice as large as the group of volunteers deployed in the past few years, said Robert Berg, a spokesman for Mayor Coleman A. Young.

News show to air Republican Chili Feed in Manhattan

By Christine Doll
Features Editor

The Charles Kuralt "Sunday Morning" news series picked the Republican Chili Feed in Manhattan Friday to report how candidates running for state and national offices are appealing to voters.

The CBS show did not pick the Republican Chili Feed because of Manhattan's grass roots political activism nor because of the state's staunch conservatism; Lyndon Johnson, in 1964, was the last Democratic presidental candidate to carry Kansas' popular vote.

The film crew came to Manhattan to film how candidates are trying to lure minority and women voters to the polls Tuesday, Nov. 8.

"Studies show that the black and women groups' issues have gotten lost. (This year's) voter turnouts are predicted to be one of the lowest," said Mel Lavine, writer and producer of the story, which is scheduled as the cover story on Sunday's show, two days before the elections.

In 1980, a little more than 53 percent of the eligible voters cast presidential ballots, one of the lowest percentages in U.S. history. This year, some scholars are predicting even lower turnouts, he said.

"We spend too much time and money on campaigns. It tends to zap the vitality out of the process."
—Nancy Kassebaum U.S. senator

The CBS crew picked the chili feed because it wanted the story to feature representatives who have tried to influence women or minority issues. One of the featured representatives will be Sen. Nancy Landon Kassebaum, who spoke at the chili feed to endorse Lana Oleen, a woman running for Kansas Senate from the 22nd District.

"We wanted Sen. Kassebaum because she feels keenly about women issues," Lavine said.

Kassebaum, who was the first woman elected to the Senate, has supported pro-choice legislation.

She told the audience of about 200 that the expanded length and "negative" content of campaigns is to be blamed for the falling voter turnouts.

"We spend too much time and money on campaigns. It tends to zap the vitality out of the process," she said.

To combat the tedium of the elections, people must become directly involved with the elections, she said.

"It's just as important who goes to Topeka as who goes to Washington," she said.

Nancy Landon Kassebaum and Lana Oleen are filmed by a CBS camera crew Friday night at the Republican Chili Feed. The event will be featured by CBS to show how candidates reach minority groups.

5 faculty members awarded university's highest honor

By Mary Gomez
Collegian Reporter

Five faculty members from the College of Arts and Sciences have been named University Distinguished Professors.

"Being named University Distinguished Professor is the highest recognition the University can bestow on a faculty member," said Thomas Isenhour, Dean of Arts and Sciences. "The five individuals represent the elite of the faculty."

The five are Cornelia Butler Flora, professor of sociology, anthropology and social work; Jonathan Holden, professor of English; Kenneth J. Klabunde, professor of chemistry; Patrick Richard, professor of physics; and Sadahiro Saeki, professor of mathematics.

The professors, all from the College of Arts and Sciences, will each receive a $10,000 salary supplement.

Isenhour said the resources to fund these positions have come from salary reserves within the college.

"We intend to replace these funds with income from the Essential Edge Campaign," Isenhour said.

Previously the College of Arts and Sciences awarded only two University Distinguished Professorships, these two being a part of the five that are awarded in various colleges at K-State.

The College of Arts and Sciences presented the plan to the Kansas Board of Regents to reallocate funds within the College of Arts and Sciences for the selection of five additional Distinguished Professorships, according to Martine Hammond, director of Academic Affairs for the Kansas Board of Regents.

"They (College of Arts and Sciences) presented to the board the criteria and procedures for the selection of the five individuals."

The College of Arts and Sciences requires that professors recommended for the title of University Distinguished Professor have "not only made the major contributions in teaching, research, and service required for the rank of Professor, but have achieved beyond ordinary expectations to become truly distinguished in a discipline."

The College of Arts and Sciences has a number of other individuals who should be named University Distinguished Professor, Isenhour said.

Isenhour said his goal is to acquire the resources so that all deserving faculty can be so recognized.

The college will be honoring the new University Distinguished Professors at a reception Nov. 21.

Democrats anticipate loss

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Even as Michael Dukakis insists there is time to score an upset in the Nov. 8 balloting, many Democrats already are second-guessing his campaign strategy in anticipation of another national election defeat.

"After the election, this may be the campaign considered the worst managed in this century," said Democratic Sen. Terry Sanford of North Carolina.

Like many people in his party, Sanford insisted he thought Dukakis still had a chance to defeat Republican nominee George Bush, but he didn't sound overly optimistic.

"I'd bet money on it," he said of the chances of a Dukakis upset. "But I wouldn't bet my law license on it."

Other prominent Democrats have urged Dukakis openly for weeks to sharpen his responses to Bush's steady attacks.

"Dukakis has really got to take off the gloves," said Sen. Sam Nunn of Georgia. "He's got to defend himself. ... I wouldn't have been a punching bag on some of these issues."

Democrats have lost four of the last five presidential elections, and current polls point to the likelihood that Dukakis will make it five of six.

Even Dukakis recently conceded he didn't get his message out clearly enough and was too slow in responding to negative commercials from the Bush campaign. But as he headed into the final week of the campaign, Dukakis proclaimed, "There is time to do it."

"They're running a beautiful campaign right now," said Ed Martin, executive director of the Texas Democratic Party. "But a proper campaign for three months has been compressed into three weeks."

Among those in the ranks of the second-guessers was New York Gov. Mario Cuomo, who told reporters he thought the Dukakis campaign had failed to figure out a general election strategy.

"They did so well by the end of the Democratic convention, they said, 'OK, now we'll take it easy, get some rest, take our breath,"' Cuomo said. "The other guy started landing jabs and uppercuts and picking up points."

"Every campaign has a jillion things go wrong with it," said John White, a Texan and former Democratic Party chairman who backed Jesse Jackson for the presidential nomination. "And if you're behind, everybody points them out."

"Our timing has just been terribly off," said White. "In August nothing happened, so we started August work in September, September work in October."

He attributed that to inexperience.

"We do not have any historical memory," he said. "Every campaign is a brand new one, we bring in brand new people."

"I don't want to do a post-mortem until there's a mortem," said Mark Siegel, a political consultant and member of the Democratic National Committee. "I don't think this patient is dead. I think a little sick."

Added Siegel: "I don't want to be critical of the campaign (but) there were a lots of things some of us would like to have seen done differently."

Official language violates American principles

Commentary

DWAYNE LIVELY
Collegian Columnist

In the near future, citizens of the United States will have to make an important decision. On Nov. 8, voters in Florida, Arizona and Colorado will already be making that choice. They will decide whether or not they want to declare English as their official language. California adopted a similar measure in 1986.

Many Americans want English declared as the official language of the United States via a constitutional amendment. On the the surface, such a decision seems simple. English is the "official" language of this country by default. The Constitution was, after all, written in English. It is, however, the content of the Constitution, not its form, that guides America and the Constitution establishes no official language. To declare an official language would not be a difficult legal task, but it would force us to re-examine our national values and to make some difficult choices.

Since its founding, the United States has welcomed the immigrants of other nations. The Statue of Liberty and Ellis Island have become symbols of our "open door policy" that has brought many diverse cultures into one giant "melting pot." Although the cultures have fused together for the most part, English remains the country's dominant language. Although it has adopted many words and phrases from immigrants, American-English has remained virtually unchanged and is still much like the English brought from Britain.

In the America of today, however, Americans are less and less enchanted with the "melting pot" ideal. Part of the problem has been the steady stream of hispanic immigrants coming into the United States in the past 20 years. In 1987, the Census Bureau estimated that nearly 315,000 hispanics immigrated here, compared to the 286,000 Italians who entered through Ellis Island in 1907 during the peak of turn-of-the-century immigration. On average, 300,000 hispanics immigrate to the Unites States every year. With this constant influx of people, hispanic culture has begun to slowly dominate cities like Miami, San Diego, San Antonio and the southern cities in Arizona. Many of the English-speaking people who live in these areas are beginning to feel alienated in their own country.

In Miami, according to a number of local citizens, it is possible to live comfortably without speaking English, but not without speaking Spanish. Although they also admit that one must know English to succeed in business, this is what is causing the "Give me your huddled masses yearning to breath free" ideal to wear thin with many Americans.

Many of the English-only supporters feel that hispanics have been too slow to learn English and therefore also have been slow to assimilate the American way of life. As a result, many states have been forced to spend extra money to publish multilingual ballots and government documents so hispanics can participate in government and many English-speaking Americans have been forced to learn Spanish. This is also creating tension.

Proponents of English-only legislation are also out to protect the United States from becoming another Canada. Canada is a nation divided by language. Its population is divided into English- and French-speakers. In the recent Winter Olympics in Calgary, Alberta, American viewers might have noticed that all award presentations were in English and in French. All public announcements must be given in both languages.

Canada, however, was settled in part by the French and in part by the English. It wasn't a one-language nation that was influenced by heavy immigration. The parallel with the United States is therefore not a correct one.

The United States was originally settled by the Spanish and the French. The English drove out the French (into Canada) and they drove out the Spanish in a number of wars and eventually conquered places like Texas. (Remember the Alamo? Its name and architecture are Spanish, but its story is an American legend.)

Those who want to declare English the official language are ignoring both the original Spanish influences in America, (Colorado and Florida are both Spanish names, after all) and the history of immigration to the United States. In the past, the trend was that new immigrants, the "first generation," spoke their old language; their children spoke both English and the old language; and their childrens' children spoke only English. There is no reason to believe that the hispanic immigrants will not follow this pattern. To say that hispanics are any slower than the earlier Italian or Polish immigrants in learning English is racist.

It is the larger influx of hispanic immigrants that is making them seem slower. The large immigration of hispanics is creating a larger first generation of Spanish-speakers and more people require a greater amount of time to teach. English-only supporters have evidently overlooked this fact. They have also ignored another fact. It is estimated that by 1998, if the present rate of hispanic immigration continues, 52 percent of California's population will be hispanic. California represents about one-ninth of the U.S. population.

This will give hispanics control of the single-largest block of electoral votes in the country. Hispanic influence in Florida, Texas and Arizona will be almost as strong. Hispanic voters will be on the verge of having enough political power to repeal any legislation that declares English as official.

To adopt English as the official language of the United States would be, and is, an attempt to avoid the inevitable. Spanish is in the United States and it is here to stay. Like the Norman Conquest in 1066, which has influenced English for the last 900 years by mixing it with French, the "Spanish Conquest" promises to have as much of an impact on our American version of English. We have already adopted altered Spanish words into American-English, like "buckaroo," an American form of the Spanish word "vaquero" (cowboy), and phrases like "hasta luego," "buenas dias" and "adios, amigo" are entering into everyday American speech.

There is a way to stop this trend and preserve the "purity" of American-English. A number of white supremacist groups have recommended that the United States close its borders to immigration. This goes against one of this nation's oldest ideals. The groups haven't said it, but if we closed borders, we would also have driven out all the hispanics living in the United States, including Spanish-speaking U.S. citizens, and we would have to forbid those who have already learned Spanish from speaking it. Otherwise the language would still change.

We would also have to deny our Spanish and Mexican heritage, changing the names of cities like Los Angeles and San Francisco, which would no longer be considered to have American names.

This doesn't seem like a very American thing to do to protect a language that we borrowed from Britain, does it?

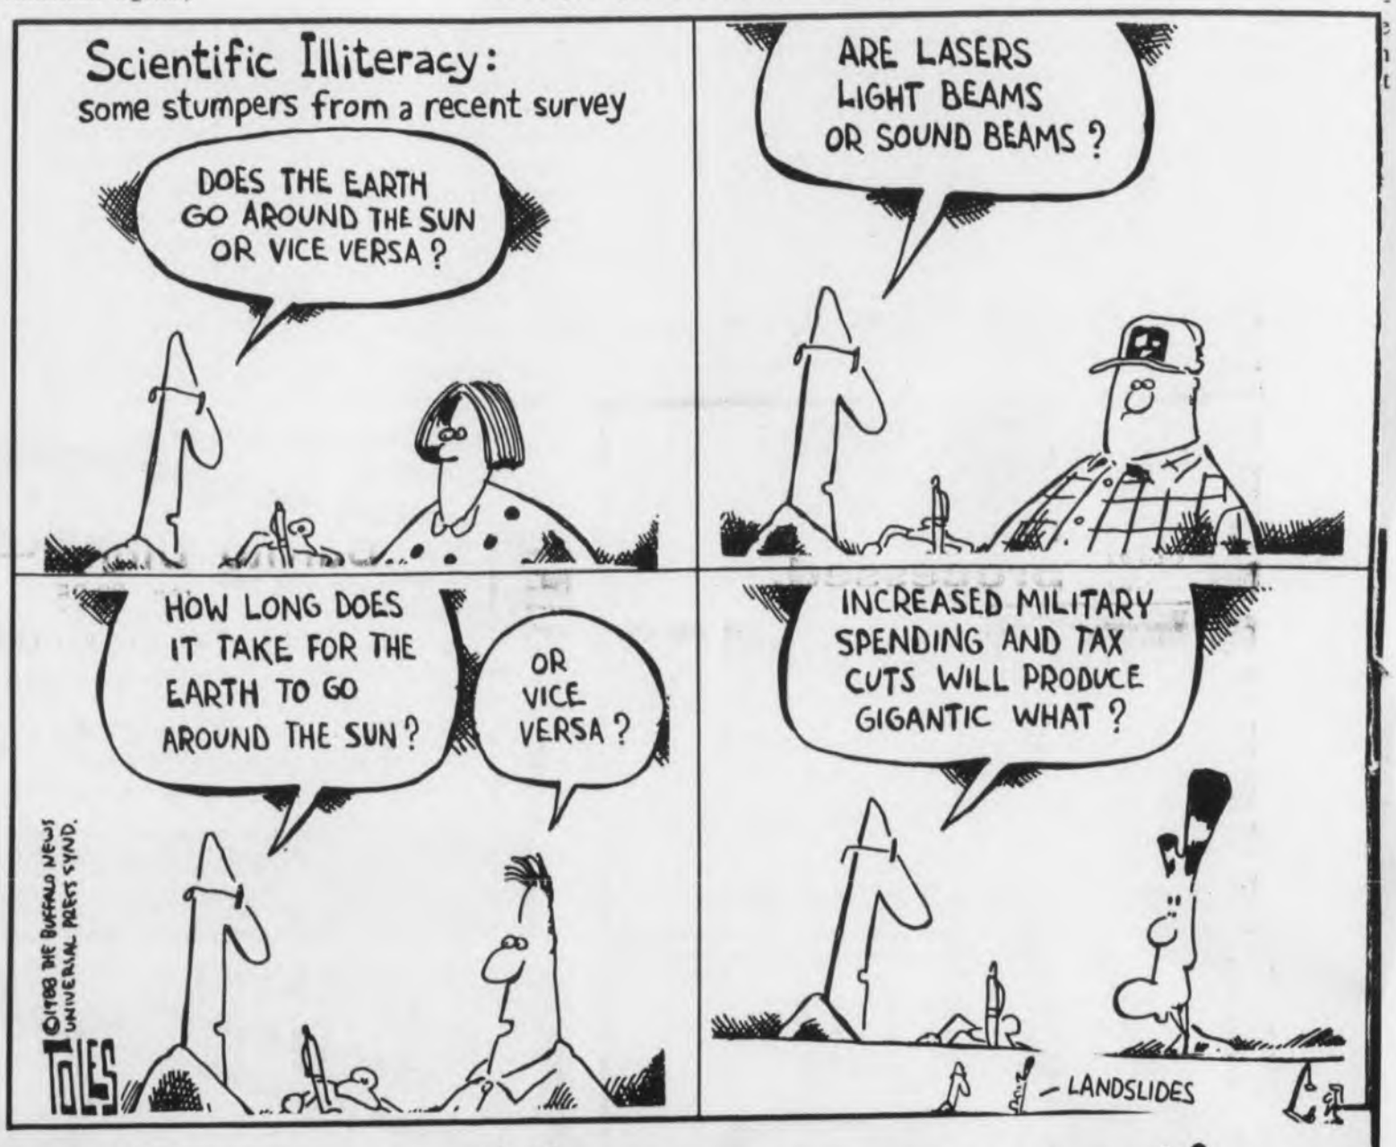
Increasing enrollment poses unique question

Student football season tickets sales are down by half from last year — the lowest in recent memory.

Fewer students are attending events at McCain Auditorium than in the past.

There are four fewer bars in Aggieville then there were just four years ago. Now that the change in the drinking age is complete, less than half of the student body can drink in the bars that remain.

Considering that enrollment is up dramatically, where the hell is everybody?



It is a question worth asking. If students aren't spending their free time pursuing traditional college-student activities, then what are they doing?

They could be studying, and thus have no spare time. Stranger things have happened.

They could be involved in paranormal activity, such as participating in the election or conducting mass seances in Ahearn Field House. Stranger things have happened.

In this election time, as candidate after candidate claims to be just another student or to know what the students want, it would be interesting to know their answer to the missing student body question.

The candidate who can answer that would really have the pulse of the student body. Now that would be strange indeed.

Chilean problems may continue

It seems that Chile is finally getting the attention it deserves in regard to its military government. I was especially pleased to read the editorial recently praising the referendum that was held in which Dictator/President/General Augusto Pinochet was defeated. Unfortunately, not all the facts were included in the editorial, and in a couple of cases, statements were made that were simply wrong.

There is no doubt Pinochet is wearing out his welcome as leader of Chile. During his fifteen years as president, more than 10,000 young men and women have "disappeared." Many more have been tortured, threatened, beaten during demonstrations, arrested without cause, and held without charge. A few have even been killed on the streets, like two children riding their bicycles through a puddle of water, and the police shot down an electrical wire into that same puddle, electrocuting them both. Two years ago, an American citizen was burned to death by the police during a peaceful demonstration on the campus of the Catholic University of Chile.

And these cases are not so isolated. Pinochet has had in effect for all 15 years, a state of emergency that grants the government unlimited censorship powers. It is unlawful to assemble in groups of 10 people or more, in public or private. A dusk to dawn curfew remains in effect for all of Santiago, Concepcion and Calparaiso. Police officers always travel in pairs, and they all have machine guns!

It is very ironic that this situation was created because of the democratic process itself. In 1970, the Chilean people elected Salvador Allende Gossens as president. Allende was a devout Marxist and one of the first things he did as president was nationalize all of America's assets. These corporations included ITT, Ford, Coca-Cola and the copper mining companies of Kennecot and Anoconda Copper. This was more than a billion dollars annually in lost income for the United States.

Needless to say, this did not sit well with the American government. President Nixon gave the CIA the authorization to undermine the Chilean economy in hopes that conditions would worsen enough to force a military coup. The CIA did. This is also all the CIA did. Contrary to popular belief, the coup that resulted from the CIA pressures was purely the work of the Chilean military. Nobody had anticipated the bloodbath that took place on September 11, 1973.

But, in about six years, things were starting to get out of hand. It was realized that the housing projects, started many years earlier, were nothing more than concentration camps designed to contain the poor, and make it all too easy for the military to storm the camps and collect the growing opposition.

In 1980, conditions were bad enough that Pinochet was forced to hold a referendum, similar to the one held just last week. The difference was that people were also asked to ratify the new Chilean constitution. And, unlike the most recent vote, Pinochet was able to win the referendum, most likely by stuffing the ballot box himself.

It is the constitution that is the biggest danger to Chileans at the present moment. Even though he lost the referendum last week, by law, he will still be the head of the military for life. He still has the guns, and will still be able to dictate, through torture, imprisonment, and even murder, the policy in Chile for years to come.

If real change is to occur, the next president will have to defeat the military candidate and pass an entirely new constitution, all against all against the wishes of all the guns in the country.

This is no small task. For real change to occur, Pinochet will have to be removed from office as General, and most likely from the country as well.

Perhaps the United States should pull another Ferdinand Marcos and offer to fly him out of power. Then, and only then, will Chile have the opportunity to resume its path of democracy.

Armed with bombers, tanks and more than 1000 troops, General Pinochet gave Allende until noon to surrender, but the president refused. As the deadline passed, Pinochet ordered the bombers to drop their bombs on La Moneda, the presidential palace, to force Allende's evacuation. Still, the president refused. Then, the troops were sent behind the tanks to apprehend him. When they came out, Allende was dead.

At the time, Pinochet was a hero. There were no more food lines, no more gas shortages, businesses were sold back to American coporations, and Chileans were going back to work. Pinochet began an extensive housing program for the poor. Within a short time, Chile had the most extensive middle class in all of South America.

Canadians criticize U.S. debates

By The Associated Press

TORONTO — Canadians caught up in debate over a free trade pact with the United States are following a heated political race of their own and paying less attention than usual to the U.S. presidential campaign.

What they do see south of the border is often dismissed as an excessive amount of media handling and too much superficial treatment of the issues.

Canadians congratulated themselves after the debate series among the leaders of their three major parties by comparing the breadth of the discussions with the debates between the U.S. candidates.

"Canada's leaders were much more forthright, articulate and revealing of themselves than the candidates for the White House in the U.S. debates," the independent Globe and Mail newspaper said in an editorial. "Issues received far more vigorous airings here within the limits of television."

Six hours of debates between Prime Minister Brian Mulroney of the Progressive Conservative Party, Liberal Party leader John Turner and Ed Broadbent of the socialist New Democratic Party crystallized the free trade agreement with the United States as the campaign's dominant issue.

Before Mulroney dissolved Parliament Oct. 1 to call the election, some concern was voiced that a November election could be complicated because voters might be distracted by the U.S. campaign.

Instead, a once complacent political race, in which Mulroney appeared headed for easy victory, now is becoming among the most electric in memory.

A survey by the Environics polling firm found that 74 percent of Canadians either watched the debates here or followed news reports about them. Polls have concluded that Turner easily won the debates, in which he accused Mulroney of selling out Canada in the free trade agreement.

Anything less than a majority government for Mulroney in the Nov. 21 vote places in doubt the future of the agreement, which would eliminate tariffs and trade barriers between the two countries over a 10-year period.

The U.S. Congress easily approved it this year, but Canada's Parliament has yet to act on it. If passed in Canada, the agreement would take effect Jan. 1.

Some political analysts say the U.S. campaign between George Bush and Michael Dukakis is simply considered boring. They note that the contest slipped off the front pages in the United States in its middle weeks.

"There's no clear favorite for Canadians," David Eirikson, a political science professor at the University of British Columbia, said in a phone interview. "They are busy with domestic affairs."

A Gallup poll published by the Toronto Star in early October said 56 percent of Canadians would vote for Dukakis and 44 percent for Bush, if they could take part in U.S. elections.

The cornerstones of Canadian public opinion about government generally are based on such issues as health care, social services and other policies that would be to the left of the Republican Party.

Power companies troubled by decision

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — In a decision dismaying to power companies throughout the country, the government has told a Wisconsin utility that planned repairs to a coal-burning power plant will subject it to strict air pollution standards for new plants.

Utilities are worried because they fear the decision, the first of its kind, could apply to hundreds of plants. If so, utilities say they might have to close old plants, forgo needed repairs or incur huge expenses to meet the standards.

The Energy Department says the decision could jeopardize future power supplies, but environmentalists say the federal government should have enforced the standards years ago to improve air quality.

The Environmental Protection Agency's decision marks the first time the federal government has intervened in renovations at a coal plant. In the past, EPA has not become involved because state authorities administering the federal Clean Air Act have never brought such projects to the agency's attention. Wisconsin is the first to do so.

EPA said the Wisconsin Electric Power Co.'s Port Washington plant near Milwaukee should be covered by new plant air standards because renovation work will result in an increase in current emissions of several pollutants, including sulfur dioxide, a major cause of acid rain.

EPA administrator Lee M. Thomas said the agency is working on a policy to cover past renovations at coal plants since the Clear Air Act was written in 1971. "The agency is considering what steps may be necessary" to address previous projects, he said in a letter to the company.

"This will be setting a precedent for the entire country," said Bob Beck, environmental manager for the Edison Electric Institute, trade association for the nation's private utilities.

Wisconsin Electric, which had planned to spend about $71 million to replace cracked steam drums, says the work is routine maintenance and should not trigger tougher air standards for new plants.

Under EPA's pollution guidelines, it could cost the company $800 million to fix the plant, industry analysts say.

Edwin R. Anthony, spokesman for the trade group, said the nation has 821 coal-fired generating units of which 360 are smaller than 200 mega-watts. "My guess is that most of these (smaller) plants are over 35 years old," he said.

Utilities are increasingly relying on "life extension" projects to keep old plants running. Plants with a tax life of 30 years can be used for 60 years with careful renovation.

J. Allen Wampler, assistant secretary of energy for fossil energy, wrote EPA its decision "could result in aggravating an expected shortfall in electric generating capacity in the 1990s or, at best, in the construction of less economical methods of generating electricity."

The most important air standard covers sulfur dioxide emissions, a principal raw material for acid rain. Port Washington now burns coal emitting 2.5 pounds of sulfur for every million BTUs provided.

Relaxed restrictions may ease tensions

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration is expected to relax some diplomatic and trade restrictions against North Korea early this week as part of a coordinated strategy with South Korea to ease tensions on the peninsula, according to U.S. officials.

Although modest, the moves are believed to be the most extensive the United States has adopted toward North Korea since the Korean armistice was signed 35 years ago. An official announcement could come as early as Monday.

The officials said the U.S. trade embargo against North Korea, one of the tightest in the world, will be relaxed, possibly to remove the ban on the sale of U.S. medical supplies to North Korea. There also may be an easing on currency exchanges with North Koreans.

In addition, a prohibition on U.S. diplomats having substantive diplomatic contacts with North Korean representatives may be lifted, said the officials, who asked not to be identified. North Korea is one of a handful of countries with which the United States does not have diplomatic relations.

The United States allowed limited contact with North Korean diplomats in early 1987 but then restored the ban after U.S. officials said there was convincing evidence that North Korea sponsored a terrorist incident last November in which a South Korean passenger plane was blown up over Southeast Asia. The incident claimed 115 lives.

South Korean President Roh Tae Woo has been encouraging the administration to demonstrate more flexibility toward the north and came here 10 days ago with that message.

Since then, the State Department has been working with the Treasury Department and other agencies on the paperwork required to carry out the changes contemplated.

Historically, South Korea has, with U.S. help, tried to isolate North Korea but Roh has altered that policy by calling for trade between the two countries and for summit meeting with President Kim Il-Sung.

As U.S. officials see it, Roh's moves reflect increased South Korean self-confidence based on the country's growing economic strength and the success of the summer Olympic games held in September in Seoul.

North Korea made no attempt to disrupt the games, which Roh took as an encouraging sign. In addition, he has been under strong domestic pressure to make an effort that could lead to the eventual peaceful reunification of the peninsula.

The officials said recent developments have left North Korea more isolated than before. Its principal backers, China and the Soviet Union, ignored North Korea's appeals for a boycott of the Olympics.

Only Cuba and a handful of other leftist countries supported the North Korean call.

The officials believe that the combination of events may have left the North Koreans more amenable than before to increased peaceful contact with the south.

Eagles can be seen at Rocky Ford area

By Guy Peverley
Collegian Reporter

Those who keep their eyes on the cottonwood trees in the Rocky Ford Fishing area during mid-November or December may see the country's national bird, the bald eagle.

Bald eagles are usually north of Manhattan from November until early in April. The most common time to see them is in December and January, said John Zimmerman, professor in biology. The eagles usually leave early in April and go north for the summer, Zimmerman said.

In the peak viewing period, as many as 24 bald eagles can be seen in the River Pond or Rocky Ford areas, Zimmerman said.

"The bald eagles like big cottonwood trees to roost in," he said.

Every year there is a Christmas count. In the past, up to 100 people have participated, Zimmerman said. The people count the birds within a seven-mile area. Usually, 40 or 50 bald eagles are seen.

The number of bald eagles wintering in Kansas has been gradually increasing since the late 1970s. In 1979, 188 eagles were sighted. By 1987, the number was 472.

The numbers vary with the weather, said Charles Nilon, Urban Wildlife Biologist in Pratt. If it's a colder winter in the North, there will be more eagles wintering in Kansas. Usually 300 to 400 bald eagles winter in Kansas, he said.

Despite their name, bald eagles aren't bald. Their heads are covered with white feathers, said Ted Cable, assistant professor of forestry. Bald eagles do not have this feature until they are about four years old.

The turkey vulture is easily mistaken for a bald eagle. They are roughly the same size and look basically the same in flight, Cable said.

The two can be distinguished by their wing position when soaring. The turkey vulture holds its wings more at a v-shape when soaring, whereas the bald eagle holds its wings more parallel, he said.

"The bald eagles like to be near open water," Cable said. They feed on live and dead fish and wounded or dead ducks.

The bald eagle is protected and is on the endangered species list.

Kansas political history 'radical'

By Matt Bunker
Collegian Reporter

Kansas — wide open spaces, clean air and political conservatism.

That is how many people think of the Sunflower State. But Kansas' politics haven't always been that way, according to several K-State professors familiar with Kansas history.

"Initially, Kansas was viewed as a sort of hotbed of radicalism," said Sue Zschoche, assistant professor of history.

In 1867, Kansas was the first state to hold a referendum on the issues of women's and blacks' suffrage, Zschoche said. Both issues were defeated, but because they were brought to a vote, Kansas was perceived as a "very liberal place."

This image of Kansas, which was greatly overstated, was particularly popular on the East Coast, she said. Eastern feminists referred to Kansas as "sacred soil."

"In regard to women's suffrage, people like Horace Greeley (editor of the New York Tribune) were saying things like, 'Well, it may work in a place like Kansas, where they're innovative, but I don't know if we want to try it back here where we're much more staid,'" Zschoche said.

Much of Kansas' progressive image came from a small but highly visible group of free-staters who came to the state from Massachusetts to ensure that slavery wasn't extended to Kansas, she said.

Most of Kansas' population consisted of farmers from the Ohio River Valley, Zschoche said.

"(The farmers) were against the extension of slavery, but they didn't much care about slaves," she said.

The 1890s brought the Populists to power in Kansas, said Merlin Gustafson, associate professor of political science. This group, called the People's Party, was part of a farmers' protest movement.

"Farmers were getting low prices; money was scarce — they couldn't pay their loans. They had drought and the railroads were exploiting them with high rates. Many farmers went into the Populist party," Gustafson said.

In 1892, the People's Party nominated James Weaver as its presidential candidate, he said.

"(Weaver) got 1 million votes, which, in that time, was a surprising number," Gustafson said.

One of the famous Populist campaigners from Kansas was Mary Lease, he said. She told farmers to "raise less corn and more hell."

Populists in Kansas supported some radical ideas by 19th century standards. These included an eight-hour workday, popular election of senators, secret ballots and a graduated income tax, which was a "shocking idea at the time," Gustafson said.

The Populists also supported government ownership of railroads and utilities — a socialist idea that sprang from the farmers' frustration with the high cost of getting crops to market, he said.

K-State even had a Populist president for a brief period in the 1890s, Gustafson said. Thomas Will was appointed president in 1896 by the Populist-controlled Board of Regents.

The Populists wanted a new curriculum at K-State, especially where economic principles were concerned, he said.

"The Republicans said Will was trying to make K-State a 'socialist' school.

"National papers were alarmed at what was happening out here," Gustafson said.

In 1898, the Republicans regained control of the state and fired Will, along with some other faculty members.

Will's portrait in Anderson Hall and in a graduate student office in the history department, named somewhat tongue-in-cheek for Will, are the only mementos of Will's tenure at K-State, Gustafson said.

"Otherwise, (Will) is a non-person around here," Gustafson said.

The Socialist Party also had a modest presence in Kansas for a number of years, said Homer Socolofsky, professor of history.

"The Socialist Party began to have a candidate for governor in 1896 or '98. They continued to have a candidate for governor and many other state offices until 1956," Socolofsky said.

The highest proportion of the vote their candidate for governor ever received was about 4 percent, he said.

During World War I, the Socialist Party was anti-war and this stance hurt the party in Kansas and nationally, Socolofsky said.

Before World War I, the Socialists elected mayors, county officials and some Kansas legislators, particularly in the southeast part of the state, he said. Southeast Kansas was a mining area with heavy unionization.

Among other things, the Socialist party was seeking government ownership of means of production, Socolofsky said.

Problems in Construction Science: CAD Applications in Engineering, Architecture, and Construction (2 UG)
Prof. James F. Goddard. December 27, 1988-January 10, 1989. Monday through Friday except January 2, 1989 from 8:30-11:30 a.m. Seaton Hall, Rooms 221 and 222a

The course will cover the fundamental uses of Autocad and its applications to the professions of engineering, architecture, and construction management. This course will involve 1 lecture hour per day and 2 hours lab per day. The assignments will be rigorous and will require out of class time on the computer from 7:30 a.m. to 4:45 p.m. each day.
Limit: 15
Pre-req: Any university level computer language course or applications course
Fees: $94 UG; plus purchase of personal diskettes (5¼ " double-sided double density) will be required

Graduate Seminar in Chemical Engineering: Waste Reduction and Minimization (1 G)
Profs. L.E. Erickson and L.T. Fan. January 3-6 and 10, 1989. January 3 from 1:00-4:30 p.m., January 4-5 from 9:00-11:30 a.m. and 1:30-3:30 p.m., January 6 from 9-00 a.m.-Noon, and January 10 from 1:30-4:30 p.m. Durland Hall, Room 152

There is a need for chemical and civil engineering students to have some background and knowledge of hazardous substance management and control, to understand the need for waste reduction and minimization, and to appreciate how engineering methods can be applied to hazardous substance tracking and treatment processes. This seminar attempts to meet these needs. The target audience includes full time undergraduate and graduate students and college graduates who are employed.

The course will emphasize waste reduction and waste minimization and it will include the following: 1) Introduction to waste reduction and waste minimization; 2) Methods used for waste minimization audits; 3) Methods used for hazardous substance tracking; 4) Case studies in which audits and tracking have been employed; 5) Integrating waste reduction and waste minimization into engineering design; 6) Minimization of waste generation through failure analysis and control system evaluation; 7) Student project reports that summarize current literature, original research, or applications of the techology to a particular example problem.

Asst. Prof. Ludwig Villasi. December 26, 1988-January 8, 1989. Monday-Sunday from 8:00 a.m.-10:00 p.m. London, England

Study the decorative arts, interiors and architecture of England. Artistic and cultural locations are targeted such as: the Tate Gallery, the Museum of London, the National Gallery, the Geffrye Museum and the Barbican. Trips to Stratford and Bath highlight the diverse nature of the British culture. Students will read comprehensive guides prepared by the professor and will submit a paper following the tour.

Asst. Prof. David E. Balk. December 28-31, 1988 and January 3-7, 1989. Tuesday-Saturday from 8:30 a.m.-Noon. Justin Hall, Room 254

Group Dynamics for Human Service Providers will provide an overview of the processes and dynamics of small groups. The first part of the course will emphasize such phenomena as group roles, group task and maintenance functions, decision making within small groups, forces that impede or enhance group movement, informal communication within small groups, group formation, and the structure, activities, and methods that promote small group development. The second part of the course will pay attention to the use of small groups within educational and social service agencies; topics covered will be running meetings and conducting groups for specific target populations. Some attention will be given to the circles of learning strategy. The third part of the course will focus upon the emergence, efficacy, and pertinence to human service providers of mutual help groups. Between one-third to one-half of the student's time will be spent in two small groups to which the student is assigned; one group (called the "Learning group") will be given the task of reviewing concepts presented in the text; the second group (called the "planning group") will be given the task of designing a presentation that will involve the rest of the class members.

Winter Intersession

December 27, 1988

Division of Continuing Education
Kansas State University
Manhattan, Kansas 66506

The two weeks between Fall and Spring Semester are a special time at KSU — parking is easy, and life on campus is extremely pleasant. Intersession is an excellent way to take courses — it allows the student to pursue one course intensively, without interruptions and demands of other coursework or other campus activities. Classes generally meet about three hours a day. Over 600 students will be enrolling in undergraduate or graduate classes, making their holiday season a festival of learning and sharing. It's a productive way to conquer the after-Christmas blahs.

Winter '89 Intersession offers 39 credit courses — of 1 to 3 credits each — from a wide variety of departments and colleges within KSU. Tuition and registration procedures are explained in this schedule. Questions about specific course content or requirements should be addressed to individual instructors. If this publication doesn't answer all your questions, please call the Division of Continuing Education at 913-532-5566 (toll-free in Kansas, 1-800-432-8222).

REGISTRATION

Intersession is open to KSU students and to the public. Prior enrollment at KSU is not necessary and registration is a simple one-step process.

Intersession registration will take place in the BASEMENT OF FARRELL LIBRARY; registration dates are December 5-7 and the registration staff will be available from 8:30 a.m. to 4:00 p.m. those three days. Additional registration will be accepted from 8:00 a.m. to 6:00 p.m. Monday through Friday at 317 Umberger Hall*, from December 8 through the first day of class. The Division of Continuing Education Registration Office will be closed on December 26 and on January 2.

Tuition is due at the time of enrollment. (Some lab and materials fees are also due at this time. See schedule.) The decision as to which courses will "go" will be based on the number of registrations recorded by 4:00 p.m. on December 7. The go/drop list will be posted near the Information Desk in the K-State Union on Monday, December 12; go/drop information will also be available from the Continuing Education Registration office (317 Umberger Hall*, 532-5566).

Students unable to enroll in person December 5-7 may phone or mail in their registration. These registrations will be processed (in the order in which they are received) ONLY if spaces remain in the class as of 4:00 p.m. on December 5. Students may request a friend to enroll for them to maximize their chances of getting into their first-choice class.

Students are asked to check with their advisers to ensure that the Intersession class will meet degree requirements.

Students must show written evidence of payment of any financial delinquency to the university in order to register for Intersession.

BE PROMPT!!

Although registrations in most "go" classes will be accepted until the first day of Intersession, students are encouraged to register during the December 5-7 registration period at Farrell Library. The "go/drop" decision is based on enrollments collected during that period. Delays in student registration could result in courses being cancelled; students interested in Intersession courses should register December 5-7 to be sure their preferred classes have a good chance of going as scheduled.

LATE ENROLLMENTS

A $10.00 late fee will be charged for enrollments after the second class meeting ends, but before one-third of the class meetings have elapsed. A late fee of $25 will be charged for late enrollments after one-third of the class meetings have elapsed but before two-thirds of the class meetings have elapsed. NO ENROLLMENTS WILL BE ACCEPTED AFTER TWO-THIRDS OF THE CLASS MEETINGS HAVE ELAPSED.

COSTS

Tuition is $47 per undergraduate (UG) credit hour and $67 per graduate (G) credit hour and is due at the time of enrollment; tuition is the same for Kansas residents and for non-residents. Some classes will require lab fees, materials fees, or other costs, and these are indicated in the course listing. The lab and materials fees will be collected at registration. Lab and materials fees collected by Continuing Education are non-refundable after the go/drop decision has been posted (December 12), except for courses which have been cancelled. Travel arrangements, for courses requiring them, must be made with the instructors as early as possible.

CREDIT

The maximum credit allowed is three (3) hours per student. Anyone wishing to enroll in more than three credit hours must have written approval from his or her academic dean at the time of registration. STUDENTS WISHING TO SIGN UP FOR COURSES ON AN A-PASS-FAIL BASIS MUST DO SO AT THE TIME OF REGISTRATION, OR BEFORE ONE-THIRD OF THE CLASS MEETINGS HAVE ELAPSED.

RETAKES

Undergraduate students may retake a course during Intersession in order to improve their grade. Students must indicate "Retake" on the enrollment form when they register for the course.

AUDIT

Intersession courses may not be audited; all students attending class must pay tuition.

GRADES

Intersession grades will be averaged into the student's KSU G.P.A. Grades will be mailed to students beginning February 1, 1989.

INCOMPLETE POLICY

If an "I" is received during Intersession, and if the student does not make up the "I" during the first semester enrolled in a KSU course after receiving it, a grade may be given by the faculty member without further consultation with the student. If after the end of the first semester, the "I" remains on the record, it will be designated as "IX" for record-keeping purposes and will be computed in the student's GPA, weighted at 0 points per credit (the same number of points earned by a grade of "F"). The designation of "NR" (no grade reported) will be treated in a like manner.

CANCELLED CLASSES

No individual notification about cancelled classes will be made. The "go/drop" notice will be posted in the K-State Union near the Information Desk on December 12. Students may also phone 532-5566 after that date to inquire. Students who enrolled in a cancelled class have the option of registering in another class or obtaining a full refund. Students must report to 317 Umberger Hall*, to officially DROP or ADD.

WITHDRAWALS AND STATUS CHANGES

1) A student may withdraw from a class by written request prior to the completion of one-third of the scheduled class meetings without a grade being recorded on the student's transcript. If a student withdraws after one-third, but before two-thirds of the scheduled class meetings, a grade of W (Withdrawn) will be issued. 2) No withdrawals will be accepted after two-thirds of the scheduled classes have been completed. 3) No status changes (i.e., undergraduate to graduate credit) will be accepted after half of the scheduled class meetings have been completed. All requests for status changes must be submitted in writing to the Division of Continuing Education Registration Office.

DROP/ADD PROCEDURE

To drop or add a course, students must submit a drop/add form (or other written notice) to the Registration Office, Division of Continuing Education, 317 Umberger Hall*. Students who fail to attend class may receive an "F" unless they formally drop the course.

REFUNDS

All refund requests must be made in person or in writing to the Division Registrar, 317 Umberger Hall*. A 100% refund will be issued if the request is received before the second class begins, or if the class is cancelled. A 50% refund will be issued if received after the second class begins, but before one-third of the classes have ended. NO refunds will be issued after one-third of the class meetings have ended. Lab or materials fees collected at registration are non-refundable after December 12 except those for cancelled classes.

LIBRARY HOURS

As a special service to Intersession students, Farrell Library will extend its hours of operation. Library hours will be: December 27-30, Tuesday-Friday, 8:00 a.m.-5:00 p.m.; January 3-5, Tuesday-Thursday, 8:00 a.m.-8:00 p.m.; January 6, Friday, 8:00 a.m.-5:00 p.m.; January 7, Saturday, 1:00 p.m.-5:00 p.m.; January 9-10, Monday-Tuesday, 8:00 a.m.-8:00 p.m.

BOOKS

Textbooks (required or recommended) have been ordered for some classes and will be available at Varney's Bookstore at the start of Intersession. Information about textbooks is available from the instructor or from Varney's. Classes for which textbooks have been ordered are indicated with the letters TB at the end of the course description in this listing.

QUESTIONS

Contact the Division of Continuing Education, 317 Umberger Hall*, Kansas State University, Manhattan, KS 66506, or phone 532-5566, or toll-free in Kansas, 1-800-432-8222.

*NOTICE

The Division of Continuing Education will move its offices from Umberger Hall to College Court, 1615 Anderson Avenue (across from Nichols Hall), late in the fall 1988 semester. Due to zoning and construction constraints we are unable to project an exact date for occupancy of these quarters. The Intersession Office and Registration Office will continue to be housed in Umberger Hall, third floor, until that move.

Seminar in Planning: Planning in Developing Areas (2 G)
Prof. Mark B. Lapping. January 3-10, 1989. Monday-Friday from 8:00 a.m.-Noon. Seaton Hall, Room 252

Planning constitutes sets of discrete interventions in those sectors where marketplace failure has been observable or is anticipated. Especially in those places where domestic resource scarcities exist, planning methodologies have been employed to rationalize allocations and maximize returns. "Development planning" has emerged as a major focus of governments, non-governmental organizations, donor agencies, etc., in dealing most specifically with the problems of "third world" nations and regions.
This course provides an analysis and assessment of planning methodologies, and an assessment of theories as they specifically relate to the "third world." Additionally, this course will use the case study approach to elaborate on theories and methodologies in terms of "real-world" examples. Topics to be addressed include: (1) Defining the Third World: Beyond Rhetoric; (2) Historical Perspectives: Consequences of Colonialism; (3) Rural Development; (4) Landlord, Peasant, and the Family Farm System: Toward Agricultural Renewal; (5) Urbanization and Regional Development; (6) Development Planning: Some Examples; (7) External Relations: The "Landscape of Planning;" (8) The Implementation of Planning: A Review of the Case Studies and Critiques. TB

Winner takes all in electoral voting

By Erwin Seba
Senior Staff Writer

Every four years, the American people elect a president, right?

Well, sort of.

At the end of election day, Nov. 8, either George Bush or Michael Dukakis will gain the title of president-elect. But, in fact, the new president will not be elected, according to the Constitution, until Jan. 6, 1989, when the vote of the Electoral College is counted before a joint session of Congress.

The Electoral College is a group of 538 people who gather in delegations according to states to cast ballots for the next U.S. president and vice president.

When a candidate receives a majority of votes in the college, that candidate is elected president. What happens on election day is the choice of the electors from each state by the citizens of each state.

Each state receives a number of electors equivalent to the number of representatives and senators allotted to the state under the Constitution.

Also, the District of Columbia, which has a non-voting delegate in Congress, receives three electors. That number is equivalent to the representatives and senators which it would have if it were a state.

The Electoral College was established at the Constitutional Convention of 1787 because of the Founding Fathers' view of the people's ability to choose a chief executive, said Joseph Unekis, associate professor of political science.

"(The Founding Fathers) believed power in a democracy rested with a people in an abstract sense," Unekis said. "(They believed) the people simply didn't have the knowledge and ability to make the decision."

Unekis said the creation of the Electoral College also provided the framers of the Constitution a way to ensure the president was independent of Congress. The framers didn't allow Congress to select the president because then the legislative branch would have power over the executive branch.

"The presidency was set up as counterweight to an all-powerful legislature," Unekis said.

Another reason for the creation of the Electoral College was the absence of national organizations, such as political parties, to work out selection of the national leadership.

Yet the creation of political parties changed the Electoral College.

"What the Founding Fathers misread was the rise of political parties," Unekis said.

Instead of a college made up of a group of elder statesmen who would perform a "peer review" of nonpartisan candidates, political professionals began determining who would be the candidates and thus determined who would become president, Unekis said.

Under the Electoral College system, the candidate who wins a plurality — the highest number of votes cast — of the popular vote in a state wins all of the votes of the Electoral College delegates from that state.

"It's a winner-take-all system. If you win the state of Kansas by one vote, you take everything," Unekis said.

While one goal of the Electoral College is to ensure a clear winner in a presidential election, it failed to do just that in 1800.

Under the Constitution, the winner of the presidential election is the candidate who receives a majority — half of the total plus one — of the votes in the Electoral College.

And according to the Constitution as it stood in 1800, no distinction was to be made between the candidates for president and vice president in the balloting by the electors. Each elector was only required to cast votes for two people. The candidate winning the majority would become president and the person receiving the next-highest number of votes would become vice president.

In 1800, Thomas Jefferson ran for president on the Democratic-Republican ticket with Aaron Burr as the party's candidate for vice president.

When the Electoral College met, electors cast 73 votes for Jefferson and 73 votes for Burr. While it was clear that the Democratic-Republican ticket had defeated the Federalist ticket of John Adams and C.C. Pinkney, it was not clear that Jefferson had been elected president.

The Constitution provides for resolving a tie in the Electoral College. In that event, the election is to be decided by the House of Representatives. Each state's delegation is given one vote.

When the House met on Feb. 11, 1801, the Federalist Party held a majority and most of the Federalists chose to back Burr, who was viewed as a less dangerous radical than Jefferson.

On the first ballot, Jefferson received eight votes and Burr six. Two states could not decide on a candidate and lost their votes.

As the balloting continued in the House, Federalists sought to obtain promises from Burr that he would continue Federalist policies if elected.

Because Burr failed to give such promises, Jefferson was elected 10-4 on Feb. 17.

And at least twice in the 19th century, the Electoral College failed to elect the candidate who received a plurality of the popular vote.

In 1824, Andrew Jackson received 153,544 popular votes while John Quincy Adams received 108,740. Jackson received 99 electoral votes and Adams garnered 84. But two other candidates, one of whom was Henry Clay, held the remaining 78 votes.

Since no candidate had received a majority in the Electoral College, the election was sent to the House. With Clay's support, Adams won the election, 13-9.

In the 1876 election, Democratic presidential candidate Samuel J. Tilden won 4,284,020 popular votes, equaling 184 electoral votes. The Republican candidate, Rutherford B. Hayes won 4,036,572 votes, which gave him 165 electoral votes.

Tilden was one vote short of the necessary majority of 185 votes. The votes of three Southern states, Florida, Louisiana and South Carolina, were in doubt. Also, Oregon's electoral vote was in question. In total, 20 electoral votes were up for grabs. If Hayes could win all 20, he would have 185 votes and the presidency.

Each of the three states sent both a Republican and Democratic delegation to the Electoral College. The House had to decide which delegation had won in each of the three states, and on the qualifications of the elector from Oregon.

A 15-member Electoral Commission was appointed by the House to rule on the credentials of the disputed electors. The one independent member of the otherwise evenly divided commission was persuaded to accept the Republican view that Hayes had won in all the Southern states and Oregon's disputed vote.

Southern Democrats were promised of the removal of troops monitoring the progress of Reconstruction from their states if they accepted Hayes' election.

By a vote of 185-184, Hayes was elected president and he ordered troops out of the South.

Negative campaigns unliked but effective

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — No one admits to liking them or even being influenced by them, but they work. That's why candidates from the presidency down are running negative campaigns.

"It's sort of like television. Everyone deplores it yet people watch it," says Andrew Kohut, president of the Gallup polling organization. "They don't like negative campaigning. But they have to take their cues about these candidates from what's being offered."

Negative campaigns are nothing new. "I'm sure that in elections for the Roman Senate, people criticized their opponents," says Democratic pollster Harrison Hickman.

What is relatively new is the television "attack ad," a media tool that reinforces and magnifies a candidate's campaign rhetoric. These ads sometimes allow him to be a soft-spoken candidate while impersonal narrators trash his rival in 30-second spots on the TV screen.

"Delivering the message through television is much more effective than going out on the stump and calling the other guy a scoundrel," Kohut says.

The memorable scenes produced by Republican George Bush's TV campaign include prisoners passing through a revolving door and a harbor filled with floating trash — attack ads against Democrat Michael Dukakis about prison furloughs and Boston Harbor pollution.

"The endless images of prisoners coming through turnstiles into your living room are much more powerful than anything Bush can say on the stump in a 15-second news clip," says Kathleen Hall Jamieson, a University of Texas professor and specialist in political communications.

Dukakis began fighting back only after weeks of leaving Bush's TV assaults unanswered. Political scientist Larry Sabato says Dukakis made a misjudgment that could prove fatal in an era when "an attack unanswered is an attack agreed to."

Besides raising doubts about Dukakis, the vice president's negative campaigning "probably helped Bush overcome his wimp image, and not responding probably made people think Dukakis is passive," Hickman said.

Negative campaigning, however, can backfire. Jamieson cites the classic case of a 1966 ad against Ronald Reagan in his first bid for governor of California. The ad said Reagan was a movie actor who had played many roles and "wants to play governor."

"What a stupid ad in a community that earns its living by entertaining," Jamieson said.

Negative campaigning is rampant on the Senate trail as well this year.

Sanders powers OSU past K-State, 45-27

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

Oklahoma State coach Pat Jones said his nationally ranked team had to be wary of any team with a heartbeat. The K-State Wildcats had more than just a heartbeat — they were breathing heavy down the neck of the Cowboys all day Saturday at KSU Stadium.

The Wildcats scored on their first possession. After recovering an onside kick, the 'Cats drove 52 yards in seven plays to grab a 7-0 lead.

K-State took the lead again at 14-7, on a two-play, 42-yard drive on its fourth possession in the first quarter. After the Cowboys tied the score and then took the lead late in the opening period, the 'Cats remained close the rest of the game before losing 45-27.

"I would like to salute (K-State) coach (Stan) Parrish and the rest of those youngsters over there," Jones said. "We have a great deal of respect for them and I'm not sure if we deserved to win this game. We did not play very sharp at all. We played just well enough to win."

In the other locker room, Parrish seemed pleased with the effort his team gave.

"Our kids played really hard today," Parrish said. "We took a lot of chances in the ball game and most of them worked. We had a chance to win the game as late as the fourth quarter. I don't think (Oklahoma State) was where they needed to be emotionally today.

"We were outmanned again today," he added. "I felt that we would have needed a 14- or 21-point lead early to win this game, and we just about pulled it off."

Turnovers helped the 'Cats remain close, as they had their best day this season in both the turnover and takeaway departments. K-State's offense lost the ball just once and its defense took the ball from the Cowboys four times.

K-State's biggest takeaway came when sophomore defensive end Danny Needham intercepted a Mike Gundy pass with 11:17 left in the fourth quarter with the 'Cats trailing 38-27. K-State could not capitalize on that turnover, however, as Mark Porter's 42-yard field goal attempt sailed wide right.

Several athletes from both teams had big games. Each team had one outstanding receiver and one outstanding running back.

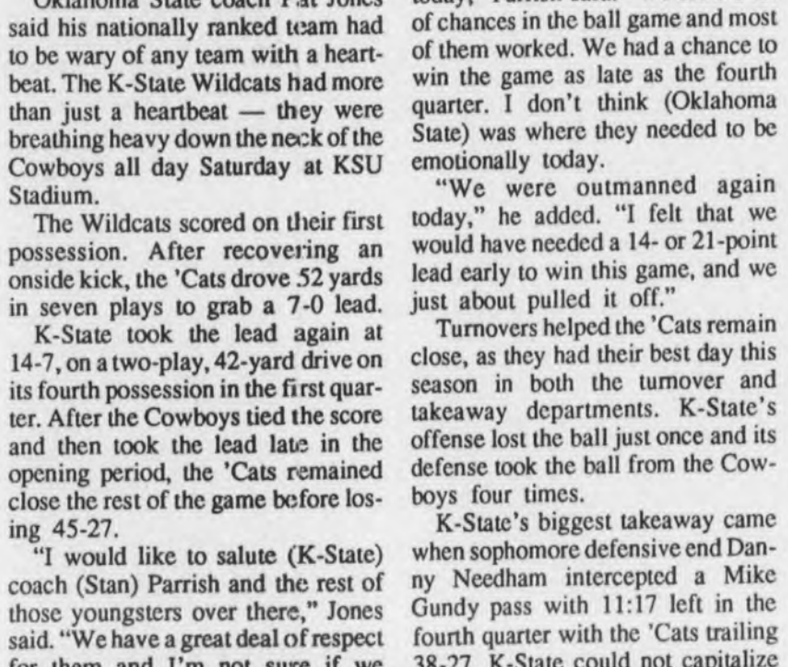
For the Cowboys, Barry Sanders rushed 37 times for 320 yards and three touchdowns. Flanker Hart Lee Dykes had nine catches for 127 yards and a touchdown.

"Sanders had 320 yards, and we needed every one of those today," Jones said. "Sanders is a great back, there's no question about that. I think next week will be Barry's real test against Oklahoma."

K-State's coach also had praise for the runner from Wichita.

"Sanders reminds me of Joe Morris of the New York Giants, only Sanders is probably better," Parrish said. "His running style and size are very similar. Barry is short, but he is in no way small."

K-State's duo of offensive standouts include receiver Greg Washington, who had 11 catches for 157 yards and a touchdown, and Lee Pickett, who rushed 17 times for 130 yards and a touchdown.



"Pickett bruised his knee right before halftime or he probably would have had a bigger day than he did," Parrish said. "As for Washington, I'm biased because I've seen him play eight weeks on a team that hasn't won a game. He just continues to impress me. When we get to the scoring zone, we want to get the ball to him."

Both team's quarterbacks had better than average days. K-State's Carl Straw connected on 26-of-52 passing attempts for 270 yards, while his counterpart, Mike Gundy, was 15-of-19 with three touchdowns.

"We protected the quarterback better today than we have all year," Parrish said. "I think that if we play this hard down the stretch, we might just sneak up on some people and surprise them."

Oklahoma State improved to 6-1 overall and 3-1 in the Big Eight Conference. K-State dropped to 0-8 and 0-4.

POSTGAME NOTES: Sanders' 320-yard effort is the 16th-best in NCAA Division I-A history, is an all-time Oklahoma State best and is second-best in Big Eight Conference history.

Washington sets receiving records

By Mike Rouse
Sports Writer

When Greg Washington transferred to K-State from the University of Cincinnati, he had no idea of how big of an impact he would make to the Wildcats.

"I had no indication at the beginning that I would do this well at all," Washington said. "But I knew I was capable of doing well."

Going into Saturday's game against Oklahoma State, Washington and Cowboy wide receiver Hart Lee Dykes were first and second, respectively, in the Big Eight Conference. Washington led the Big Eight in receptions with almost six per game. He kept that lead by catching 11 passes for 157 yards and one touchdown. Dykes had nine receptions for 127 yards.

A feud between the two started earlier in the week when Dykes said he didn't know who Washington was.

"He is an excellent player. I was upset earlier when he said he didn't know who I was," Washington said.

Washington's touchdown catch in the first quarter was his seventh of the year and set a school record for most touchdowns in one season, breaking Mike Wallace's mark of six in 1982.

He also set a school record for most receiving yards in a year with 728 yards. The old record of 721, set by Dave Jones, had stood for almost 22 years.

"I wasn't aware of how close I was to the record. It is an honor to get a record at the Division I level," he said.

Washington, after being redshirted in 1987, has stepped into the spotlight as K-State's top receiver this year. But Washington said the receiving corps is a family and all are top-notch.

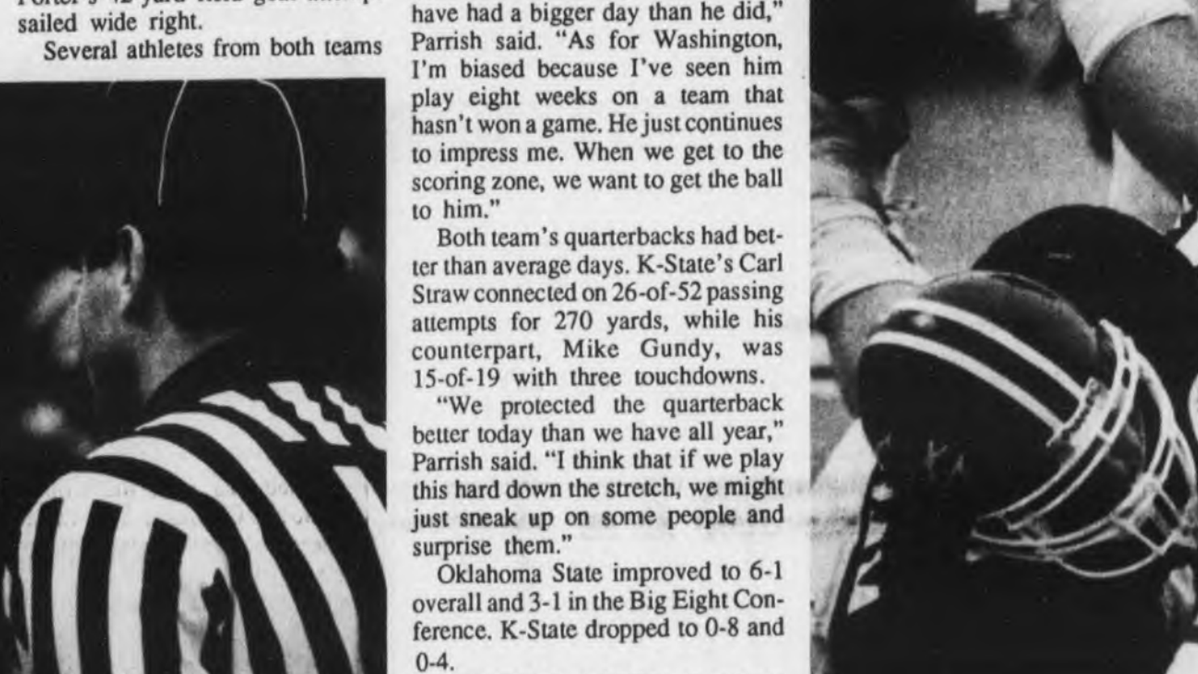
"All our receivers are excellent. Every game we play is as a group. We have a hell of a receiving corps," he said.

Five of the top 15 receivers in the Big Eight are from K-State. Alan Friedrich, Mark Austin, Antoine Dulan, Frank Hernandez and Washington all rank among the best in the conference.

Parrish has had nothing but praise for the play of Washington so far this season.

"Greg is a great player. Certainly I think he is an All-Conference player," Parrish said.

"We have very good receivers on this football team and we let the quarterback make the reads to see who they throw to, but when we get down towards the end zone, we look to Washington."



Oklahoma State head coach Pat Jones also praised the play of the 5-foot-10, 155-pound junior from Austin, Texas.

"He is a very good receiver. He could line up and play for anyone, any place. He is a very good football player," Jones said.

Washington said he must play hard every game. He added that it doesn't matter how many catches he has, as long as he is able to execute.

"I really don't think about how times I am going to be thrown the ball each game. I just think about when I do to make something happen," he said.

Washington is also steadily climbing the Wildcats' career pass reception chart. His 728 yards ranks him 10th on the all-time list. Washington needs 70 yards in the next three games to pass Gerald Alphin (798 in 1983-85).

Nebraska's fans impatient in win

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Rate the impatience of the Nebraska fans on a scale of one to 10.

The fifth-ranked Cornhuskers, one of the winningest programs in college history, spent a Saturday afternoon struggling to turn back a stubborn Missouri team.

They trailed 6-0 at halftime, the first time a Nebraska team has been shut out in the first half since 1986.

And Coach Tom Osborne heard boos from the among the crowd in the umpteenth straight sellout in Lincoln.

"We had our student section booing us, which was a lot of class," a sarcastic Osborne said after the Huskers' escape. "They booed the governor and the chancellor a couple of weeks ago so I guess they think they've got things figured out.

"There will be people upset with us because we didn't make the point spread. That was the most ridiculous point spread I've ever seen in my life because I know what they've got. When Missouri is playing well, they've got people who can play with anybody."

In other Big Eight games, No. 8 Oklahoma blew away Kansas in the second half 63-14 and Colorado stopped Iowa State's three-game winning streak 24-12.

Missouri freshman Jeff Jacke kicked a field goal from 51 yards away five minutes into the fourth quarter to give Tigers an 18-17 lead. He tied a Tigers record with his fourth field goal of the game and put upset into the minds of the crowd.

But the Huskers, 8-1 and 4-0, sprang fullback Bryan Carpenter free for a 49-yard touchdown run and Chris Drennan kicked a 23-yard field goal to deny Missouri, 2-5-1 and 1-3.

"Missouri, traditionally over the years, plays Nebraska pretty tough," said Coach Woody Widenhofer. "Our kids aren't intimidated by Nebraska, even though they're a great football team and are very well coached. Nebraska is a great team and we have to do the things we did today, but not turn it over."

Big 8 Roundup

One half of playing Oklahoma close satisfied Kansas coach Glen Mason.

"When you've lost — what is it, eight straight — you usually just want to forget about 'em," said Mason, after staying within 21-14 of the Sooners in the first half at Norman. "But I've never enjoyed a football game more than I did that first half."

The enjoyment level was a little less on the other sideline at Norman.

"We were embarrassed to only be ahead by seven points against a team were were favored to beat by half a hundred," said Sooners coach Barry Switzer. "Our defense did not play well in the first half. We made defensive mistakes, penalties that allowed them to stay in the game."

The Sooners, 7-1 and 4-0, scored five straight times in the second half to win.

Joe Henderson ran for 99 yards for Iowa State, 4-4 and 2-2.

For the first time since the nightmare season of 1985, when K-State was last going through the trauma of an impending coaching change, the Wildcats will visit the not-so-friendly confines of Lawrence on Saturday for a college football game.

It's a game the Wildcats will win by 10 points, 30-20.

You heard it here first.

Unlike that 1985 team, which went to Lawrence under imerim coach Lee Moon and was thrashed 38-7 by the Jayhawks, this K-State team has the same coach now that it had for the season opener.

Granted, current Wildcat head man Stan Parrish is on his way out at season's end, but the motivation Parrish provides his troops on a weekly basis is likely to play a huge role this weekend in Memorial Stadium.

Parrish has a chance to become the only coach in K-State history to never lose to KU. In 1986, his first year at the helm, Parrish's troops thrashed Kansas 29-12. Last season's 17- 17 tie was the last time K-State was able to avoid defeat.

Saturday's contest will end the losing streak altogether.

I've been picking K-State to win and improve on a daily, weekly, and monthly basis since Parrish arrived, it seems. This time, however, I see something in the eyes of Parrish's players I've not seen since 1982, when K-State made it's lone bowl appearance — fire and fight.

Here we are, eight weeks into the season, and K-State hasn't one win to show for its efforts in 1988. Yet, unlike last season, no one has folded the tent.

The reasons have been well documented by reporters and fans alike. Parrish, since he resigned, seemingly has brought the greatest number of supporters out of the woodwork since Orkin last brought termites out of the walls of Allen Field House in Lawrence.

But the biggest reason the fire and fight is still there is that these players, knowing their coach is but three weeks from leaving them forever, have something to prove to their detractors, their loyal coach, and, most importantly, themselves.

It might not show in wins and losses, but this team has more talented players at the skill positions than any K-State team in five years — since that bowl year, in other words.

The quarterbacking duo of Carl Straw and Paul Watson is great. Lee Pickett and the running corps are more than adequate and the group of wide receivers is the best in the conference, if not the country.

And don't forget the offensive line, which played its best game of the season Saturday against Oklahoma State. If Straw has the time to throw against the Jayhawks that he had against the Cowboys, numbers will ring up on the scoreboard Saturday faster than they do on a cash register when my sister goes shopping for clothes.

Defensively, the Wildcats will put pressure on the KU passer, and, with the exception of Jayhawk wide-out Willie Vaughn, they should be able to neutralize the KU offense.

With Parrish, a tough offensive unit, an improving defense, and the always-reliable Mark Porter doing the kicking in possible late-game pressure situations, the Wildcats should be in good shape Saturday.

The fans on the hill will go home disappointed. Porter will boot three field goals, Straw will throw two touchdown passes and Pickett will run for another as K-State will win.

Intramural meet sparks memories

By Mike Rouse
Sports Writer

Some old memories were brought back Sunday when the intramural cross country meet was run at Warner Park.

The two-mile course used by the recreational services for the meet is the same one used for Kansas' high school cross country championships every November. Some of the runners ran on this same course before they came to K-State.

"We try and keep the same general course each year, but with the high schools running here, the courses sometimes get mixed up," said intramurals director Steve Martini.

"I ran here four years while in high school, so I was used to it and that helped me today," said Steve Hilger, sophomore in engineering and member of the "C-Men," who won the team title in the independent category.

The meet had four different categories including fraternity, women, independent and residence hall. Each team had five runners, with the top four times counting toward the team total. The team with the highest point total won its division. Each runner got one participation point for running in the race.

In the fraternity race, Rick Meyer of Beta Sigma Psi won in 10:28. Beta Theta Pi won the team title with 29 points, followed by Tau Kappa Epsilon with 25 points and Sigma Chi with 19 points.

In the women's race, Janell Armstrong of Alpha Delta Pi won in 14:30. The ADPis also won the team title with 34 points, followed by Gamma Phi Beta with 20 points and Alpha Xi Delta with 16 points.

In the independent race, Al Bohlke of Team Norton won in 10:56. The C-Men won the team title with 27 points, followed by Team Norton with 26 points and Smith House with 21 points.

In the residence hall race, John Novak of Marlatt 1 won in 10:49. Marlatt 1 also won the team title with 36 points. Marlatt 3 and Haymaker 3 both ended with 20 points, but Marlatt 3 finished second because its fifth runner finished higher than Haymaker's did.

Mark Heininger leads the pack during the intramural cross country meet Sunday in Warner Park. The meet was run on the same course used for Kansas' high school cross country championships.

Martini said some runners liked the course because they had ran there before. But most who were out there for the points didn't enjoy it that much.

"I think the people who are into running enjoy it, but the guys who are out here just for the points probably hate it," he said.

"It is a pretty hard thing to do on a Sunday afternoon, but I think they had a good time. The weather was beautiful," he added.

About 190 people signed up for the meet, and about 80 percent participated.

"It was a good event. I was real pleased with the turnout and how well it was run," Martini said.

Wildcats place in 2nd division at Big Eight meet

By Chris Hays
Sports Writer

Before Saturday's Big Eight Conference cross country championships at Stillwater, Okla., K-State coach John Capriotti said he would not be "all that thrilled" if his teams finished where they were expected to finish.

Well, Capriotti was not too thrilled after his women's and men's squads finished fourth and fifth, respectively — exactly as expected.

Capriotti, even though he was generally pleased with the times, definitely didn't expect his teams to finish in the middle of the pack.

"I was kind of disappointed because I really thought both teams were capable of getting third," Capriotti said. "If both teams would have taken third, then I would have been much happier, but, actually, we were pretty close to (third)."

Pretty close, indeed. Only six points separated the women from third-place Iowa State, while the men missed third by just 12 points.

Nebraska took the women's title and Oklahoma State finished second. Iowa State, Colorado, Nebraska and Oklahoma State, in that order, finished ahead of the men.

The men's squad may have finished a lot higher if the Wildcats' top runner, Pat Hessini, had not fallen at the 2½ -mile mark. After being stepped on, Hessini was able to get up and finish the race in 29th place, but the junior had had a good shot at finishing in the top ten.

"That hurt us quite a bit," Capriotti said. "Overall, I think our guys were a little fatigued. We had been training real hard and then took it kind of easy this past week, but a week is not enough after training the way we were. But we should be running really well at the district meet."

The big surprise on the day for the men was David Warders. Warders, who had been K-State's fifth man, turned in the Wildcats' fastest time.

"David ran really well. He was hurt this summer and so he hasn't been training with the top four or five guys, but he should be in great shape within the next two weeks," Capriotti said.

Rounding out the rest of the K-State finishers were: David Keller (20th), Ron Smith (23rd), Jan Jonssan (26th), Brian Zwahlen (31st) and Rob Hays (35th).

The women, who claimed third last year, made a move at repeating but fell short, possibly because the back four runners have still not reached their potential, according to Capriotti.

"They were still a little further down in the field than I would like them to be," Capriotti said. "We ran pretty close to our potential, but (finishing) average doesn't do a lot for me — I don't like to be average."

Freshman Janet Haskin again led the women, turning in a third-place finish.

"Janet Haskin and Angie Barry (seventh) ran really well," Capriotti said. "And Janet Treiber (20th) ran well for most of the race, but she got a little tired toward the end."

The top three K-State women were followed by Marge Eddy (25th), Jenny Faunce (28th), Becky Ives (29th) and Jennifer Hillier (30th).

"Our back four runners ran together, but I still feel that they can run a lot closer to the front of the pack," Capriotti said.

"Overall, I wasn't too disappointed," Capriotti said. "But I know that we can run much better."

Sports Briefly

Tennis team wins triangular

Things are really coming together for the K-State women's tennis team. The Wildcats proved that once again by dominating both Wichita State and Tulsa in a triangular Saturday in Wichita.

The Wildcats rolled past Tulsa 9-0 and soundly defeated Wichita State 7-2. Freshman Tracy Parker proved herself in her first varsity match at No. 6 singles by defeating both Gloria Logan of Wichita State 6-3, 6-3 and Nikki Edwards of Tulsa, 6-0, 6-1.

Chavez captures boxing title

LAS VEGAS — Things are looking up for Julio Cesar Chavez, the World Boxing Association and World Boxing Council lightweight champion. Now it's on to the junior welterweight and welterweight divisions, although the unbeaten Chavez might defend his two 135-pound titles. He picked up the WBC title Saturday night when he beat fellow Mexican Jose Lus Ramirez in a highly anticipated match that ended on a sour note.

Ramirez, losing for only the seventh time in 108 bouts, couldn't continue when an accidental heat butt slashed a wound in his forehead during the 11th round. Since Chavez was ahead on points at the time, he was declared the winner on a unanimous technical decision. His record now is 60-0, with 50 knockouts.

Los Angeles dumps Chiefs

LOS ANGELES — Quarterback Steve Beuerlein returned to the starting lineup and passed for 248 yards and Bo Jackson and Marcus Allen each scored touchdowns Sunday as the Los Angeles Raiders topped the punchless Kansas City Chiefs 17-10.

Beuerlein, who started the first three games this season before being replaced by Jay Schroeder, completed 18 of 29 passes while being intercepted once and sacked once.

The Raiders, who beat the Chiefs 27-17 two weeks ago, are 4-5 while Kansas City's 1-7-1 record is the worst in the NFL.

Ultimate disc not conventional sport

By Mike Nichols
Government Editor

When KC Strip took the field against the Flow-ters Saturday in Lawrence, the Stray Cows and the Bettys were there to watch, as were a few of the Horizontals.

Maybe the names of the teams are unusual for serious athletic competition, but not all aspects of ultimate flying disc adhere to the conventions of most serious sports.

"It's all in the spirit of the game. ... Ultimate spirit is what makes playing so intense," said Chris Pierson, instructor in English and member of the only Manhattan team, the Flow-ters.

Ultimate flying disc incorporates the passing, running and scoring of football without any tackling or violence. There are seven players on each side, all of whom may catch or throw the disc.

Once a player receives a pass, the player must pivot on one foot and release the disc before a standing count of either 10 or 12 seconds, depending on pre-established rules. To score, one must catch the disc in the opponent's end zone. Each score is worth one point, and matches end when one team scores 13 points.

Another unconventional aspect of the sport is that there are no referees. The players make all the calls themselves.

"Ultimate is a non-policed game," Pierson said. "You make your own calls, and that's what makes it fun. There's a lot of competition, but everyone's friendly — that's ultimate spirit."

Ultimate spirit may account for about 50 or 60 people and a handful of dogs braving cold winds in 45-degree weather.

Collegian/David Mayes

Chris Pierson, of the Flow-ters from Manhattan, and Mike Sunderland, of the KC Strip, reach for a loose disc. KC Strip beat the Flow-ters at an ultimate flying-disc tournament Saturday in Lawrence.

And although it wasn't a tournament, the competition was intense and there wasn't a single argument over a questionable call.

Ultimate is more than 15 years old.

The first national ultimate tournament was in 1973 in California, where the sport originated, Pierson said. The California Condors took the first nine national titles. Later titles alternated between Chicago's Windy City and the Tuna Bees from St. Louis.

Ultimate isn't only a men's sport.

"We've got about 14 girls that play on a regular basis," said Colleen Kelly, Kansas City resident and member of the Stray Cows. "We're seeded second in the Central Region (of the Ultimate Players Association) and we hope to make it to nationals this year."

The Stray Cows will play in regionals next week in Madison, Wis., in preparation for the national finals in San Diego, during Thanksgiving weekend.

Husband accused of murder; wife falls over cliff to death

By The Associated Press

LINVILLE FALLS, N.C. — Chestoa View, a scenic overlook jutting out from the Blue Ridge Parkway in the mountains of North Carolina, has become the focal point of a murder case full of contradictions and intrigue.

Did Jim Gibbs, a hardworking father of three, push his wife, Helen, and another woman hundreds of feet to their death Oct. 17?

Or is Gibbs a victim in his time of grief, an innocent man charged with murder for an accident?

"I can't see a shred of evidence against him," said Gibbs' younger brother, Gerald Gibbs. "He adored that woman."

But authorities said Gibbs' account of what happened is full of holes. That includes his explanation that the three adults left five children alone at their motel and went to Chestoa View to take photos of the sunset.

"If he wanted a sunset picture he wouldn't be taking them facing east," said Howard Parr, chief ranger for the parkway for the National Park Service. "We also were suspicious how this guy was at a loss to explain what happened just before they fell."

Sheriff Bobby Haynes said Gibbs, 37, of Fayetteville, was arrested after "things didn't add up." The couple had been having marital problems and a $100,000 life insurance policy had been taken out on Helen Gibbs last spring, he said.

Gibbs' lawyer, Ronnie Mitchell, acknowledged problems in the 10-year marriage but said that the couple had reconciled and that the insurance was Helen Gibbs' idea. "I don't know who the beneficiary is," he said.

Initial reports indicated Helen Gibbs, 31, and her friend, Susan Haire, 32, of Ladson, S.C., died in an accident. Gibbs, who also fell, told investigators he had his back turned when one of the women apparently slipped over the two-foot wall and pulled the other one with her.

Gibbs said he fell while trying to rescue the women and was hospitalized overnight, but Parr said he suffered only minor cuts and bruises. "If he had fallen 100 feet like he claimed, he would have been hurt a lot worse than he was," the ranger said.

Two tourists who were at the overlook that evening told a ranger they heard voices from the darkened gorge below. They said they heard a woman scream, "Oh, my arm!" and then heard a man's voice, said Ranger J. Russ Whitlock.

Gibbs, who is being held without bail, maintained his innocence when he was taken to jail.

"I swear to God I didn't do it," he said. "I don't know what happened. You're all wrong. You're crazy. I didn't do it. I tried to help my wife."

Several of Gibbs' co-workers and friends said he was a dedicated and loving husband and father who never missed a day of work in nearly 19 years at a tire plant. Helen Gibbs was a nurse at a Veterans Administration hospital.

Savings institutions map future strategies

By The Associated Press

HONOLULU — Savings institution executives, enduring their worst losses since the Depression, face critical decisions next year that will determine the future shape of their industry.

In the first six months of 1988, the nation's 3,048 Savings and Loans (S&Ls) lost $7.5 billion. By year's end, losses will almost certainly surpass the previous record of $7.8 billion, set in 1987.

Amid the tide of red ink, 4,050 S&L executives and their spouses gathered in the palm-ringed resort hotels along Waikiki Beach for the 96th annual convention of the U.S. League of Savings Institutions, the industry's oldest and largest trade group.

In the opening session Monday, executives will begin mapping strategy for 1989, when Congress will consider whether taxpayers must pay to bail out the S&L deposit insurance fund, which so far has been industry-funded.

At midyear, 497 institutions were insolvent, but still open, because federal regulators lacked the money to shut them down and pay off depositors. An additional 408 were solvent but losing money.

The Federal Home Loan Bank Board, which regulates S&Ls, estimates the total cost of cleaning up the mess at $45 billion to $50 billion, but private analysts go as high as $100 billion.

Congress will almost certainly include some sort of measure aimed at preventing the problem.

Racist incidents occur

By The Associated Press

STANFORD, Calif. — The president of Stanford's Black Student Union spoke calmly, controlling her anger in the tumult of a protest against racism on campus.

There's a dangerous link, she said, between racist terms scrawled on posters at Stanford, racial slurs at Smith College and a "ghetto party" at DePauw.

"These aren't isolated incidents," said Mary Dillard. "And it's happening at Cornell, Pennsylvania, Harvard, Yale. There's something wrong with the best and the brightest."

Officials of the nation's top universities are trying to figure out what is wrong and how to fix it, but the results so far have been disappointing.

Stanford President Donald Kennedy, mindful of racist incidents last year, warned freshmen in his orientation address this fall that "bigotry is out." Yet soon afterward two more racist acts shocked the campus.

The first was the scrawling of the word "niggers" across a black fraternity poster. In the second, a poster of German composer Ludwig van Beethoven was altered so he appeared to be black after a fraternity house discussion about historic figures alleged to have some black ancestry.

It takes A's, high test scores and other accomplishments to get into Stanford University, but as Dillard noted, "there is an appalling ignorance among many students about other cultures and that leads to trouble."

Ewart A.C. Thomas, a psychologist and dean of Stanford's School of Humanities and Sciences, notes "there have been more overt acts of racism in this decade" throughout the country.

"People have attributed it to policies coming out of Washington attacking civil rights legislation," he said. "There might be more to it than that, but a tone set in Washington could increase the sense among people from underrepresented groups that their gains are now being assailed."

"In many ways Reagan's eight years ... have taken the shame out of racist behavior," said the Rev. Jesse Jackson, who spoke to 4,000 Stanford students on Friday.

In recent incidents elsewhere, racial slurs were scrawled on notes slipped under a door and tacked onto a bulletin board at Smith College, and members of an all-white white fraternity at DePauw threw a "ghetto party" in which they scrawled racist grafitti on their house.

Cheryl Taylor, vice chairperson of the Black Student Union, argues that many whites don't understand what is racist, "so it still persists, in the country and on the campus. Stanford is not divorced from society."

Despite its image and high tuition, its idyllic campus and links to the conservative Hoover Institution, 97-year-old Stanford is no longer simply a bastion for wealthy whites.

U.S. announces closing of bases

By The Collegian Staff

After announcing the closings of several military bases around the United States, government officials are not sure how the closings will effect Fort Riley, said Army spokesman Lt. Col. John Chapla in Washington.

Fort Riley Media Relations Officer, Mark Meseke, said the closings are no surprise because they occur periodically. Meseke said he believes Fort Riley is safe from being closed due to its recent expansion and construction.

Chapla said the Secretary of Defense appointed an independent commission earlier this year to study and make recommendations about which bases to close. Chapla said there were two tasks for the commission.

The first was to develop a methodology to determine which bases to close. The second task was to define which bases would be affected.

By Dec. 31, the commission must provide the Secretary of Defense with the list of proposed closings. If the list is accepted, it will be sent to Congress for approval.

President Reagan recently signed a bill which stated Congress must accept or reject the list as a package, Chapla said. If the list is not accepted, the commission will develop a new proposal.

Chinese architect served role in planning cities for 40 years

By Sarah Kobs
Collegian Reporter

Spending two years in a foreign country takes a great deal of adjustment; however, Chinese architect Charles Chen said he was prepared when he came to the United States this year.

"I began studying English when I was 10 and continued throughout college," he said.

Chen, architect and planner, served as chief planner and architect for Shanghai and Beijing in China.

"Shanghai and Beijing are the two principal cities in China," said Eugene Kremer, professor of architecture at K-State. "Planning these two cities would be similar to planning Los Angeles or New York."

For 40 years Chen has served an active role in Chinese architecture and government. He was chief architect at the Beijing Institute of Architectural Design and chief architect-planner at the China Academy of Urban Planning and Design.

Chen has maintained an active role in teaching throughout his career, serving as a lecturer in architecture, planning and geography at universities in Nanking, Shanghai, Peking and elsewhere in China.

Since he arrived in the United States, Chen has served as a Regents' Lecturer at the University of California-Berkeley during the spring of 1988. This fall he has been the Edgar Snow Professor at the University of Missouri-Kansas City.

The Edgar Snow Professorship is a distinguished honor with an endowment making possible one to three visiting professors a year, Kremer said.

When he came to the United States he brought his wife, Tao Li Qin, and daughter, Chen Yu Qin. They travel as a family to universities across the nation.

His daughter, whose English name is Betty, is an award-winning author of Chinese short stories and television scripts. In China she is recognized as a member of the leading group of Chinese women writers, the Council Chinese Writers Association.

"Betty was a visiting scholar at Berkeley and UMKC," Chen said. "Unfortunately she has had a difficult time learning to speak English fluently," he said.

She studied Russian while attending Beijing University, but never had the opportunity to learn English until she first visited the United States in 1984, he said.

Chen studied architecture at the University of Liverpool, England, and graduated in 1943. He began working on his doctorate at the University of London in 1944, but was unable to finish because he was asked to be the chief planner for Beijing.

"I wanted to finish my doctorate, but I could not pass up this once-in-a-lifetime opportunity," he said.

Chen said he has enjoyed his experiences in the United States and is thankful that his wife and daughter were able to accompany him.

"I'm not homesick for China, but I do miss my four children in Beijing and my five grandchildren," he said. "I wish they could have been with us when we visited Disneyland because they would have loved it," he said.

When Chen is finished at UMKC, he and his family will go to Baltimore where he will help plan a Chinese theme park.

Contest slated for dome sculpture

By Theresa Luling
Collegian Reporter

The Kansas Arts Commission, in association with the Kansas Department of Administration, Division of Architectural Services, is sponsoring a competition to commission the creation of a sculpture to be placed on top of the dome of the State Capitol in Topeka.

The cornerstone for the Kansas Capitol was set in 1866. The original architectural rendering shows a sculpture in place on top of the Capitol. Since construction was completed in 1903, the need for a sculpture has been recognized by the public and elected officials.

"In 1984 the Kansas Legislature passed a bill which provided for the selection and commission of a sculpture," said Bob Burtch, Kansas Arts Commission information coordinator. "This is not the first time we (KAC) have sponsored the competition. A previous competition was held, but unfortunately the commission decided none of the five entries were right."

In July, the Legislature imposed a July 1, 1989 completion date for the project or the bill will expire, he said.

Although this statute specifies no single style or person, the general assumption of lawmakers and most Kansans has been that the sculpture would represent a human figure, historic or symbolic, presented in a fashion in keeping with the classical architecture of the Capitol itself, Burtch said.

The enabling legislation prohibits the goddess Ceres as the subject for the sculpture.

"It goes back to the controversey in the 70s," Burtch said. "In mythological times, Ceres was the goddess of agriculture and harvest. In particular, she represented wheat and fruit. She committed an indiscretion with her son Jupiter at one period in her life. And because of this, the Legislature objected her on the grounds of morality."

"There are no provisions for funding this project," said Burtch. "If a selection is made, we (KAC) will have to initiate a fund-raising project."

The artist whose entry is selected will receive an initial award of $1,500. Contingent upon the successful completion of a fund-raising campaign and the appropriation by the Kansas Legislature of funds to finish the project, the artist will be awarded a total commission of $50,000 by the State of Kansas to create a sculpture as work for hire, in compliance with engineering requirements stipulated by the Division of Architectural Services.

"I feel the budget is most realistic," he said. An estimated budget of $200,000 has been anticipated for the project.

The finished work shall be delivered to the Capitol for installation and henceforth the state shall own all copyright to the work, he said.

The KAC is working closely with the State Architecture Office who will ultimately bear the responsibility of completing the project, Burtch said.

The dome is not the only project needing attention, he said. "There are a number of details inside the Capitol, including artwork and stonework, that need to be completed. In the long run, I hope it (sculpture competition) will open the door to other art projects in and around the Capitol."

The Kansas Arts Commission has established an entry deadline of December 1, 1988. The commissioned sculpture shall be completed and delivered to the Capitol by April 15, 1990, prior to installation.

Newspapers endorse candidates

By The Associated Press

The Wichita Eagle-Beacon endorsed a Democrat for president Sunday for the first time in its history, saying Michael Dukakis "seems uniquely prepared to deal with the crises certain to confront the next president."

The Eagle-Beacon, the largest newspaper in heavily Republican Kansas, said in an editorial published in Sunday's editions that "the Democratic candidate has shown much deeper sensitivity toward the struggles of millions of Americans to make ends meet."

The Topeka Capital-Journal endorsed Republican nominee George Bush on Sunday, saying the 1988 election "brings to mind a popular homily: If it ain't broke, don't fix it."

"Do voters want to chance veering away from the familiar, prosperous, successful path of the last eight years?" the Capital-Journal editorial asked. "It took this long to wean ourselves from the addiction to massive spending programs of the Democrats; the nation does not need a relapse now."

Editorial staffs of the Eagle-Beacon and the two newspapers that merged to form the paper have always backed the Republican candidate for president and have formally endorsed Republicans since the 1960s, said George Neavoll, editorial page editor.

This year, the editorial board said it was disgusted with Bush's negative campaign tactics.

"I think it reveals the broad distaste that the Bush campaign, really both campaigns, has left in the mouth of the American people," Neavoll said.

"Gov. Michael Dukakis has drawn criticism from his fellow Democrats because he has refused — or has been unable — to match the Republicans in meanspiritedness and contempt for the American voters," the newspaper said.

The editorial also said that while Bush has more than 20 years in public service, "he has left his fingerprints on so few positive accomplishments." It also questioned Bush's choice of Sen. Dan Quayle of Indiana, "a feckless, shallow, politically immature man," as his vice presidential running mate.

Dukakis also was endorsed by The New York Times, the Star Tribune of Minneapolis, the Philadelphia Inquirer, the Charlotte (N.C.) Observer, the Greensboro (N.C.) News & Record and New York Newsday, which called Bush's campaign "sniveling, dirty, distorted and irresponsible."

The New York Times said the scales were tipped in Dukakis' favor as the candidate likely to do a better job of "getting America out of hock" from the Reagan administration's deficits, which it called the most urgent task facing the next president.

Bush picked up endorsements Sunday from the Detroit News, the Seattle Post-Intelligencer and the Denver Post, which said that "after wiping away the mud from both candidates, The Post believes George Bush is the better choice."

The vice president also was endorsed by the Sunday Oregonian of Portland, that state's largest newspaper; the Miami Herald and the Orlando (Fla.) Sentinel, and was praised by The Daytona Beach (Fla.) News-Journal.

Dukakis won the endorsement of Kentucky's two largest papers.

problem and possibly enter a rehabilitation program, Davis said.

Employees who receive treatment will not be able to return to work until they can prove they are drug-free, he said.

"It is better of the state of Kansas to rehabilitate someone than to throw them out on the street and not address the problem," Arck said.

If an employee refuses to take the test, it will be considered the same as a positive result, Davis said.

The test, which Arck said is "basically foolproof," is designed to detect marijuana, cocaine, PCP, opiates and amphetamines.

Hayden and members of his cabinet and staff, including the lieutenant governor and attorney general, will voluntarily take the drug screen sometime in November, Davis said.

"Gov. Hayden really believes in serving by example," Davis said. "His administration will serve as models for a drug-free work force."

Also affected by the new legislation will be the K-State Police. Campus police chief Charles Beckom said supervisors in the department have already been trained on the guidelines of the program and will review the program for individual officers this week to explain how it will affect them.

"It's a positive program," Beckom said. "It's not designed to entrap or go after a specific individual. It's designed to help an employee if they have a problem.

"It ensures that those working in safety-sensitive areas are not in any way hampered or deterred from performing their duties from drug use or misuse."

three years that they have raised the rent," said Lori Holliday, senior in elementry education.

Although the room rates at Jardine have been raised before, it doesn't seem to have hurt the occupancy level.

Jardine is made of 552 apartments and there always seems to be a waiting list, Tunstall said.

"It's still cheaper than anywhere else in town. Utilities are cheaper here," Holliday said.

Evans apartments, a small apartment complex located near Manhattan Christian College, would also experience an increase from $172 to $185 per month for a one-bedroom unfurnished apartment, Tunstall said.

Evans apartments are exclusively for single graduate students and there is very little turnover. Students living at Evans apartments may choose one roommate to live with them. Often the roommate takes over the apartment when the original renter graduates, she said.

Because the apartments are in such great demand, Tunstall said she doesn't expect the rate increase to affect Evans or Jardine apartments at all.

"It's still the best deal in town," she said.

The Kansas Board of Regents will consider the first reading of housing costs for all the state universities at its November meeting with a final decision expected in December.

"None of these figures mean anything at this point," Frith said. "It's up to the Board of Regents to make the final decisions."

let the devil go after he promised to leave him alone — forever.

When Jack died, he could not get into heaven so he went to the gates of hell. Satan remembered him and refused to allow him to enter.

Jack pleaded with the devil for something to light his way on his endless wanderings. Satan threw him a glowing piece of coal.

Jack put the coal into a turnip he was eating. The glowing turnip was called Jack's o'lantern.

When Irish immigrants came to the United States, they brought the jack-o'-lantern tradition with them. But they had to change from turnips to pumpkins because U.S. turnips are smaller than Irish turnips.

Lubbers' term 'full-time job'

Student position offers experience

By Brian Hummell
Staff Writer

Troy Lubbers was sworn into the office of student body president on his 21st birthday, Nov. 19, 1987. Although his time spent in office has not been a non-stop party, Lubbers said he is glad he ran for the office and won.

"I've met so many people that I would have otherwise never even seen. That's got to be the biggest positive," he said. "I've had the opportunity to work with the governor, with both senators of our state — people I otherwise would have never had contact with."

Lubbers, senior in business administration, is paid $300 per month for serving as student body president. Early in his term, a Student Senate proposal to increase the president's pay was rejected. The increase would have increased his salary about $30 per month.

"It's pretty good compensation, but when you work it out hour-wise, it's not even close to minimum wage," Lubbers said. "College is an intense, time-consuming thing anyway, and this just adds to the burden. It's definitely a full-time job."

Lubbers' campaign focused on trying to get more students involved in student government and his experience of lobbying on the state level.

He said he may not have achieved his goal of getting more people involved, but said his work with the Margin of Excellence, the Educational Opportunity Fund and getting the childcare legislation through Student Senate this year are his biggest accomplishments.

An earlier Student Senate constitutional change allows for the student body president to run for a second term. Lubbers said he gave the idea of a second term serious thought.

"I thought very seriously about it in August and somewhat through September for various reasons," he said. "The second year offers you a tremendous head start. You know all the people. You know who to go to to get things done. You know which buttons to push.

"On the other side of the coin, I've completed the things I wanted to do and then some. The drive to get more things done just isn't there and that's where you need an infusion of new blood."

One of those causes of burnout is mixing school with the duties of the presidency. Lubbers said his class load and class time have suffered in terms of quality and quantity during his term.

"The semester of campaigning and then the two semesters as president have dropped my grades a little. I've maintained 12 to 14 hours, but they haven't been as quality as before," he said.

Lubbers said he gives precedence to meetings and student government work over class, unless he has a test. Lubbers said he expects to graduate in May 1990.

The aspect of the job which Lubbers said he enjoys most, and believes he does best, is communicating and working with people.

"Some of the best ideas and concepts get done behind the scenes, so to speak, and that's where I feel my experience and abilities pay off," he said.

Lubbers said that ability shows best in his work with the Kansas Board of Regents.

"I've proven to myself and to them that I can be trusted with inside information, and that I will use it to the betterment of everyone involved," he said. "I'm not a 'yes' man to them and I'm not selling the house out. That's how you get things done.

"Working within the system to get things done is one of my best qualities. That's how we got the EOF passed, that's a lot of what we did with the Margin of Excellence and that's how you do most things in life."

Although Lubbers' term expires in a month, he doesn't expect to be totally out of student government.

"I'll still be around to offer my advice to the next president, if (the president) wants it," Lubbers said.

ON WASHBURN.
•RHETORIC VS. REALITY. Joe Knopp does not support making Washburn a member of the Board of Regents. Some suggest that votes to reduce duplication of programs by giving the regents authority over programs offered at community colleges and Washburn was a vote to make them " regents schools" . . . nothing could be further from the truth . . . coordination—yes . . . regents schools with full funding? NO.
•THE FUTURE: With the strongest push for Washburn in years, we need strong leadership to withstand the pressure. Joe Knopp's been there. He is more than just one vote . . . he can stand up to the pressure and will work to persuade his collegues to join him.
•THE DIFFERENCE: A Representative from Manhattan who has earned the respect of his collegues vs. a freshman who has never cast a public vote in any elected office.

Fee cards to be required

3 voting polls to be open

By Kendra Gensemer

Student Governing Association election officials are concerned about the effect changes in the electoral process may have on voter turnout.

"Our concern is that people won't have their fee card," said Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities and student government adviser.

Students are now required to show their fee card as well as their K-State ID in order to vote. There are also two voting locations in addition to the Union: Cardwell Hall and Derby Food Center.

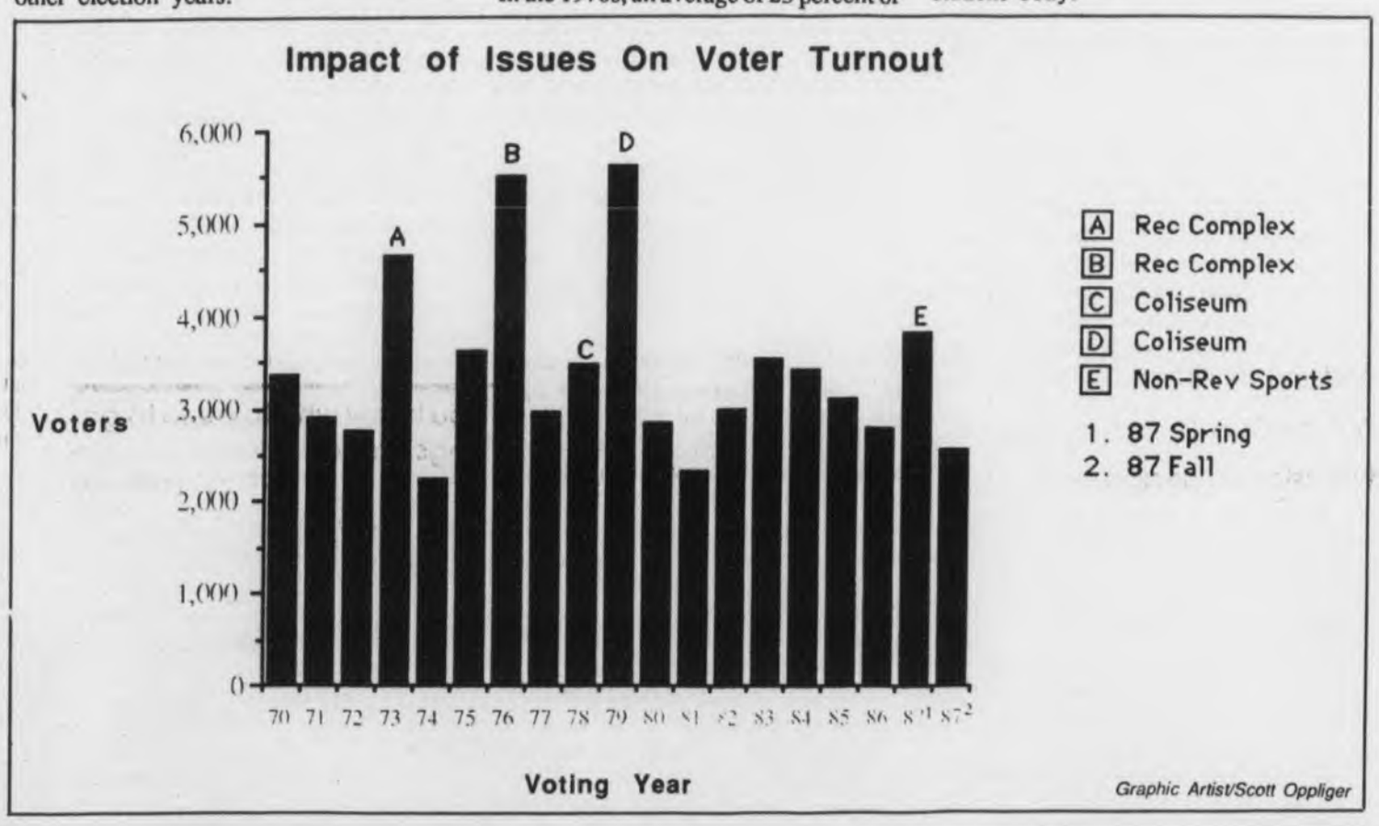
"We are really trying to push 'bring your fee card if you want to vote' and are encouraging all candidates to tell groups they speak to," Routson said.

Routson said fee cards have been used successfully in SGA voting in the past.

From 1972 to 1979, polls were located in the Union and Farrell Library, and in 1980 polls were added in the Veterinary Medicine Complex. In 1984 that changed and voting polls were restricted to the Union only because a print-out was used to count voters, thus all votes had to be cast in one spot.

During the 12 years from 1972 to 1983, students were required to show their fee cards. SGA voting statistics indicate this had little effect on voting.

The most influential effects on voting are issues, Routson said. The largest number of voter turnout occurs when a referendum is being voted on also.



SGA statistics show that in 1973 and 1976 when students voted on the construction of Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, twice as many students voted than in other election years.

The same is indicated by statistics of students voting on Bramlage Coliseum in 1978 and 1979.

Based on information compiled from SGA election statistics and Registrar's Office enrollment figures from 1970 to 1987, trends in voter turnout since 1970 have been decreasing.

In the 1970s, an average of 23 percent of the students eligible to vote actually voted.

That percentage has decreased in the 1980s — an average of 17 percent of the students eligible to vote actually voted in SGA elections. Thus, less than one-fourth of the student body has been electing a student government that represents the entire student body.

130 students to be on ballot

K-Staters will be forced to make some serious decisions at election time Tuesday and Wednesday.

With a record-high of 11 candidates running for student body president, four hopefuls for the Board of Student Publications, and 115 would-be senators, the campus has reeked of ads, issues and endorsements for the next two weeks.

Why are there so many office seekers this year?

"I think that the things that student government has accomplished in the last couple of years have been very visible," said Troy Lubbers, student body president. "The action has been very tangible. I think the interest has generated because students have seen what they can accomplish. They realize now that our student government is not a token student council that just puts on school dances."

Others aren't so sure why so many candidates have filed.

"I'm not really sure where these people are coming from. It is quite an impressive number of candidates," said Eva Chatterjee, junior in sociology and chairwoman of the elections committee for the Student Governing Association.

"In the past, we have had only three to four presidential candidates and have had trouble filling the minimum requirements for senators in some colleges.

"Except for vet med and the grad school, every college has exceeded its allotted number of senatorial positions," she said.

Chatterjee said the polling system has been revised, so that there are now three voting areas.

With a fee card and picture identification, students can vote from 7:30 a.m. to 6:30 p.m. Tuesday and Wednesday in the Union, Cardwell Hall and Derby Food Center.

Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities and SGA adviser, said the number of presidential candidates is a record, but called the numbers in the Senate races "pretty normal."

"You can look at the increase in numbers for president in two ways," Routson said. "Positively, it means students are really excited and want to get involved. On the other hand, it could mean they are unhappy with the way things are going and want to see a change."

Either way, Mike Valentine, senator in the College of Engineering, said more competition makes for a healthier race.

"I think having so many candidates is for the best," Valentine said. "When students are making the choice for student body president between 12 candidates, they can be assured that whoever wins will have had to prove themselves by then."

Doug Folk, Student Senate chairman, credited the current leadership for getting candidates interested in running.

"Troy has done a good job of getting students involved this year," he said.

Lubbers said the thing he was most proud of in his administration was that student involvement really made a difference.

"Rather than point at one particular thing we passed, such as childcare or the Educational Opportunity Fund, I think that more importantly, the credibility of students was raised," he said. "Through the regents, the legislature and our own administration, I feel students are now looked upon and approached as somewhat of bargaining equals."

Regardless of who wins the election, the new leaders will have a strong tradition to carry on. Routson said K-State's SGA is unique in that the students are given more responsibility than at most schools.

"Really, the responsibility emanates from the Board of Regents. It goes down through the president and the administration to SGA," she said. "SGA has the power, but it is delegated. Our University is special because every action somehow involves students. For example, there is some student input — by the student body president, by senators or by volunteers — on all University committees."

The candidates themselves say they are running for a variety of reasons. All cite important issues as factors encouraging involvement, but answers differ as to why there are a dozen presidential candidates.

"In my opinion, the number is fantastic," said presidential candidate John McIntyre, senior in industrial engineering. "The benefits for student government are tremendous. I've been a little worried about the recent stigma on student government because of the impeachments, but it has turned out positively because for the first time we have tested the system.

"I really hope that this year everyone stays involved after the election. In the past, the losers have had a tendency to fade back into the woodwork. I hope those who don't win stay involved."

"I think there's such a large number running because there are many issues that aren't being addressed," said Brenda Halinski, senior in elementary education and candidate for president. "I'm running because I feel there are some things that needed to be discussed and some definite changes that needed to be made."

"I'm really not sure why so many people are running. I, myself, am here because of issues," said candidate Scott King, senior in political science. "I feel that as student body president, I can represent the best interests of the students."

Routson said involvement in student government does more for a student than just put them in the spotlight.

"All in all, I think that being a student senator or getting involved in student government is like a laboratory or a classroom," Routson said, adding that after serving for seven years as SGA adviser, she still sees the election process and watching the progression of a student from candidate to leader as invigorating.

"The whole process is exciting," she said. "It's really fun to see how everyone grows and develops to his or her own potential."

Third-party coverage limited

By Scott Miller
Special Projects Editor

Although the major American news media have produced thousands of inches of copy and devoted hundreds of hours of TV coverage to the 1988 presidential election, it seems probable the majority of candidates are still unknown to most voters.

According to Ballot Access News, a San Francisco-based monthly devoted to covering third-party and independent candidates for various offices, there are at least 12 third-party and independent presidential candidates in 1988 who will be on the ballot in more than two states. One, Lenora Fulani, will be on the ballot in all fifty states and the District of Columbia.

While some minor candidates, such as Earl Dodge, who is on the Prohibition Party ticket in four states, will have their names before only a small percentage of voters (4.8 percent), others, such as Fulani and Ron Paul, are on the ballot in as many as 47 or more states.

However, by their own admission, most of the major news media have covered only the Democratic and Republican candidates.

"I'll be honest with you. There have been no stories on third parties this year. I've been pushing for it, but we just couldn't get it on," said Ken Rudin, political reporter at ABC News.

Jim Newstead, station manager at the Washington, D.C. affiliate of NBC, said coverage of third-party presidential candidates has been "next to nothing."

Paul Stevens, Kansas and Missouri chief of bureau for The Associated Press, said, "We're basically in a two-party system. In a way, maybe we perpetuate that, but it's certainly not intentional."

In determining how much coverage to give third parties, Stevens said, "We're very conscious of the fact that we serve such a diverse audience. We try to give the public what it wants. We try to gauge the public and march down the middle. From everything I can tell, we're on track in Kansas and Missouri."

Robert Daly, K-State professor of journalism and mass communications, said the major news media's exclusion of minor parties is understandable. He said third parties and independents "have never been anything but flies on the elephants."

But Barry Porster, vice presidential candidate of the Workers League, said the intent of the media in America is "to promote anti-communism and American chauvinism and to exclude systematically working-class and socialist parties from the political process."

The Workers League is a Detroit-based party with worker control of industry as its goal. Porster said the media's exclusion of minor candidates is "very deliberate on their part."

Some media analysts and political scientists, such as Michael Parenti, argue that minor parties are unimportant, not because they are "out of the mainstream," but because the major news media ignore them or, at best, choose to portray them as unimportant. Parenti is a guest professor of political science at Howard University in Washington, D.C.

In his book "Inventing Reality: The Politics of the Mass Media," Parenti writes, "Candidates who are not taken seriously by the media swiftly discover that they are not taken seriously by many voters.

"In recent contests, third-party candidates did all the things presidential candidates are supposed to do. They met thousands of voters on street corners, spoke on college campuses and at voter forums, issued position papers and press releases, traveled around the country, and probably

Candidates vying for presidency

Ron Paul

The Libertarian Party, the third largest party in the United States, is fielding former four-term Texas Congressman Ron Paul as its 1988 presidential candidate.

Paul is on the ballot in 47 states as either a Libertarian or an independent candidate. He is on the ballot in Kansas as an independent because the Libertarians were unable to gather enough signatures to meet the state requirements for political parties. His running mate is former Alaska state representative Andre Marrou.

Bill Ernest, spokesman for the Wichita chapter of the Libertarians, said because ballot access requirements in most states were written by Democrats and Republicans, they are "extremely difficult for independent and third-party candidates to meet."

"And the Democrats and Republicans well know that," Ernest said.

Ernest said the 1968 American Independent presidential campaign of George Wallace "scared the hell out of the Republican Party," and, as a result, the Republicans have sought to increase ballot restrictions. He said this has hurt the Libertarians'

■ See PAUL, Page 11

Lyndon LaRouche

Describing its independent candidate as "a mainstream Democrat," the National Democratic Policy Committee is hoping Lyndon LaRouche will affect the future of the Democratic Party in the 1988 presidential election.

Members of the NDPC want to change the policies of the Democratic Party, saying most Americans are not satisfied with the current policies. The NDPC offers LaRouche as an alternative to what it calls the "outdated" policies of the Democratic Party.

"Clearly, the voters are disenchanted with what the Democratic Party has been feeding them," said Dana Scanlon, spokeswoman of the NDPC. She said LaRouche's campaign has an affinity with the voters of the Democratic Party, but not with "Michael Dukakis, Walter Mondale, and other people who claim to represent the interests of the Democratic Party."

Scanlon said after Dukakis won the Democratic presidential nomination, the NDPC began collecting signatures to get LaRouche on the ballot as an independent candidate. It succeeded in 12 states and the

Lenora Fulani

Hoping to "dump the Duke" in November, Lenora Fulani, a 38-year-old developmental psychologist from New York City, will be one of two independent presidential candidates on the Kansas ballot.

While Fulani acknowledges she will not win the election, she believes voters must "teach the Democrats a lesson." Fulani's supporters say the Democrats have failed to represent the supporters of the Rev. Jesse Jackson's Rainbow Coalition, including blacks, workers, women, small farmers, the poor, homosexuals and other groups.

A statement from Annie Roboff, Fulani's press secretary, calls the Democratic party's nomination of Lloyd Bentsen for vice president, rather than Jackson, "a calculated insult to the black community."

Fulani is the first woman and first black in U.S. history to receive federal matching funds — almost $1 million thus far. She is also the first female and first black presidential candidate to be on the ballot in all 50 states and the District of Columbia.

In 42 states, Fulani is not listed as an independent, but as the candidate of the

James Warren

Despite difficulties with ballot access laws, the Socialist Workers Party is fielding presidential and vice presidential candidates in nine states and the District of Columbia. The candidates, James Warren and Kathleen Mickells, will not be on the ballot in Kansas.

According to Militant, the party newspaper of the SWP, the party's candidates have been ruled off the ballot in Ohio, Nebraska and Louisiana. Greg McCartan, spokesman for the SWP campaign, said election officials "arbitrarily" declared hundreds of petitioners' signatures invalid.

McCartan said these were typical of laws throughout the country that limit ballot access to Democrats and Republicans.

A member of the Socialist Workers Party since 1972, Warren ran in 1976 as the SWP candidate for Congress from the Roxbury district of Boston.

Warren's running mate, Mickells, is a 37-year-old coal miner, a member of the United Mine Workers of America Local 2300, and a women's liberation activist.

Warren and Mickells have traveled extensively, including trips to Nicaragua,

Bush's image changed

By Erwin Seba
Senior Staff Writer

If George Bush is elected president on Nov. 8, it may be due to his ability and that of his campaign aides to transform his previously negative image into a positive one.

During the early years of the Reagan administration, Reagan was billed as the Teflon President. It seemed, according to political commentators in the media, that Reagan could hold the good graces of the American public, regardless of the problems which beset the country.

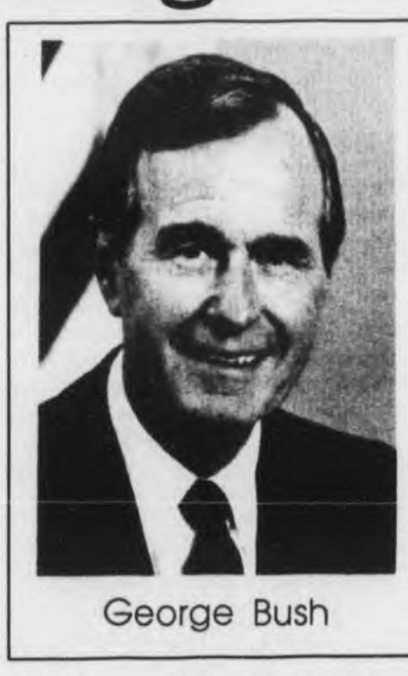
Yet the same did not seem to hold true for Bush. While Reagan was viewed by commentators as a strong leader, Bush was seen as a weak sycophant.



George Will, a nationally syndicated columnist, went so far as to call Bush a lap dog.

As the presidential campaign has progressed, though, Bush seems to have dealt with the "wimp factor," as Time magazine described it in a cover story.

From his much reported on-air encounter with CBS anchorman Dan Rather to his stump speeches in which he has described Michael Dukakis as soft on crime, Bush has eliminated his image as a fawning follower.

Shortly before the Republican National Convention in New Orleans, Bush said in an interview with Time magazine that he was underrated.

"I'm 6-feet-2 and when I go out on the campaign trail, people say, 'We thought you were a short guy.' I've been 6-2 since I was 18 years old," Bush said in the Time interview.

Perhaps one reason for Bush to have been underrated has to do with the positions he has held since beginning his career in public service.

Bush's resume lists a string of appointed offices, with the exception of the vice presidency and his two terms as a congressman from Texas from 1967-70.

In 1971, he was appointed to be the U.S. permanent representative to the United Nations by President Richard Nixon.

In 1973, Bush was picked by Nixon to serve as chairman of the Republican National Committee.

President Gerald Ford selected Bush to be the chief of the U.S. Liason Office to the People's Republic of China in 1974.

And Ford appointed Bush to be the director of the Central Intelligence Agency in 1975. Bush served as CIA director until 1976.

According to a report in the October 1988 issue of Mother Jones magazine, Bush, while CIA director, " ... played the role of a cheerleader and a front man — willfully ignorant of unpleasant news. He ignored repeated signals that rogue 'off-the-books' operations by former agents were out of control, leading to Agency acquiescence in illegal activities."

Those "rogue operators became involved in blowing up an airliner" and "assassinating a former Chilean diplomat in Washington" in 1976, according to the article prepared by Scott Armstrong and Jeff Nason.

The report further states that "Bush was even more palsied in dealing with other countries' intelligence agencies, which were illegally harassing, wiretapping, beating, kidnapping and intimidating their exile populations in the United States."

In 1980, after negotiations with former President Gerald Ford broke down, Bush was selected by Republican presidential nominee Ronald Reagan to be his running mate. During the 1980 campaign for the Republican presidential nomination, Bush ran a distant second to Reagan.

According to the 1988 Republican Party platform, drafted under the guidance of Bush campaign staff members and supporters, the party is against any increases in taxes. The platform calls for a 15 percent reduction in the tax rates for long-term cap-

Quick! Name the Seven Dwarfs.

There were Doc, Sleepy, Grumpy, Happy, Sneezy, Dukakis and, of course, the one who couldn't keep his pants up.

It was barely a year ago that the field of Democratic presidential contenders seemed as insignificant and difficult to name as that seventh dwarf from the old

Walt Disney movie. Dukakis' "plain vanilla" image, as described in the New York Times, hardly seemed the one likely to tower over the rest of the dwarfs, particularly considering he's only 5 feet 8 inches tall.

But tower he did, and Michael S. Dukakis, the 54-year-old governor of Massachusetts — the "cerebral technocrat," the "man without passion" — is the Democrats' last best hope in 1988 for capturing the presidency.

"Dukakis is earnest, ambitious, self-disciplined, intelligent and dependable ... however, his seriousness makes him seem stuffy, and his self-discipline makes him stubborn, even arrogant," a New York Times article reported.

It's a formula, however, that appears to have worked in Massachusetts. In his three terms as governor, the state appears to have experienced unprecedented economic growth. When Dukakis first took office in 1975, Massachusetts had the highest unemployment rate — at 12 percent — of any industrialized state. Today, with Dukakis in his third term as governor, that percentage has dropped to 3 percent, the lowest of the industrial states.

Dukakis is unique in that he is multilingual. He speaks Greek, French, Spanish and some Korean. He learned Korean as a result of two years spent in Korea; the Spanish he learned to speak fluently during a summer spent studying in Lima, Peru.

Dukakis lost the gubernatorial election in 1978, and worked at Harvard's John F. Kennedy Law School for three years. After hiring John Sasso, now his presidential campaign manager, to run his gubernatorial campaign, Dukakis again became governor of Massachusetts in 1982, facing the state's massive budget deficit.

He didn't cut spending or raise taxes, but instead cracked down on tax evaders withholding an estimated $640 million from the state. He later granted a three-month tax amnesty along with simplified tax forms to encourage payment and has been successful with the program.

Dukakis believes the same method could be used on a national level. According to the New York Times, the IRS is failing to collect $110 billion, and Dukakis believes $35 billion of that could be collected with improved resources.

Massachusetts, during Dukakis' tenure, has seen the implementation of the nation's first statewide health care law, as well as the development of the Employment and

Ballot choices limited by law

By Scott Miller
Special Projects Editor

Due to laws regulating ballot access, Kansas voters will be presented with a more confusing ballot and fewer choices in November.

That is the conclusion of Richard Winger, field representative of the Coalition for Free and Open Elections and publisher of Ballot Access News.

COFOE, founded in 1985 as a response to increasingly restrictive ballot requirements, is the only non-partisan organization concerned with ballot restrictions for minor candidates, Winger said. Ballot Access News is a San Francisco-based monthly newsletter containing current information on ballot access laws and third-party and independent campaigns.

One aspect of Kansas elections which Winger said is confusing and unfair is the different sets of ballot access requirements for third-party and independent candidates.

To be recognized as a third party in Kansas, a party must file petitions signed by at least 2 percent of the qualified voters in the past gubernatorial election. This year, 2 percent equaled 16,813 signatures.

Independents must gather at least 2,500 signatures for state offices, and signatures totaling at least 5 percent of the past election for county, district and township offices.

John Reinhart, press secretary for Kansas Secretary of State Bill Graves, said he did not know why the ballot access requirements are different for third parties and independents.

Winger said election laws would be less confusing if requirements for all candidates were the same.

"If people want to run as independents, they should do so, and if people want to run as members of political parties, they should be allowed to do so," he said.

Two presidential candidates listed as independents on the 1988 Kansas ballot, Lenora Fulani and Ron Paul, are actually third-party candidates whose parties could not collect enough signatures in Kansas to qualify officially as political parties. Winger said that except for Ohio and Tennessee, Kansas is the only state without a third party on the ballot this year.

In most states, Fulani is on the New Alliance Party or the United Citizens ticket. Paul is on the Libertarian Party ticket in 44 states and is an independent candidate in three states.

Another election law in Kansas which could be confusing is the restriction of write-in candidates to some offices. Reinhart said write-in candidates in Kansas are possible for all offices except governor and president of the United States. He said he did not know why.

Winger said that while Kansas has several questionable election laws, it is not as unfair to minor candidates as many states are.

The movement toward more restrictive ballot access requirements began in the 1930s during the Great Depression. Winger said the two major parties feared a labor uprising and wrote laws designed to make ballot access for third parties more difficult.

Winger said that until 1930, no state required more than 14,680 signatures for a third party to get on the ballot.

In a recent article in the Libertarian Party News, Winger writes, "The blame for the declining number of choices on our ballots can be laid squarely at the feet of state legislators. Many of them have made it far too difficult for candidates to get on the ballot.

"Many of these restrictions were excused on the grounds that the U.S. is a 'two-party system' and that everyone was free to participate in one of the two major parties, so it didn't really matter if third parties were locked out." Winger said such restrictions had set a bad precedent.

In Kansas, third parties must file their petitions for recognition at least 60 days before the deadline for nominations, and they must nominate and receive at least 1 percent of the vote for any office on the ballot in order to retain status as a political party, Reinhart said.

The deadline for filing petitions to gain recognition as a third party in Kansas was Aug. 2. Reinhart said there were no parties that filed petitions for recognition.

In response to ballot restrictions for independent and third-party candidates, Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., has introduced HR 1582, a bill that would set more equitable standards for all candidates in federal elections, according to the Aug. 27 issue of Ballot Access News.

Ken Murphy, press secretary for Rep. Jim Slattery, said Slattery supports HR 1582 because state legislatures have imposed unfair requirements on independent and third-party candidates.

"Congressman Slattery thinks it's a valid argument and it should be heard," he said.

Murphy did not know whether Slattery would be willing to co-sponsor the bill and said no action is planned on the bill this year.

According to the Oct. 5 issue of the Guardian, this election is the first since 1964 that the Communist Party U.S.A. will not field presidential and vice-presidential candidates.

"The party announced last year that its presidential campaigns — especially the efforts to overcome unfair election laws directed at third parties — were an enormous strain on its resources," reported John Trinkl of the Guardian staff.

Barry Porster, vice presidential candidate of the Workers League, said that in most states, ballot-access requirements were "designed to maintain a monopoly of the political process by the two capitalist parties and to prevent the working class from having any kind of expression in the political process.

"It is an electoral process by the rich, for the rich and of the rich."

Oleen: Prisons emerge as issue

New state prison facilities possible

By Erwin Seba
Senior Staff Writer

As her campaign for the 22nd State Senate district seat approaches its end, Republican candidate Lana Oleen has seen greater emphasis on how to deal with overcrowding in the state's prisons in her discussions with voters.

"I still think there is a greater emphasis on the penal system which has emerged," Oleen said.

She said voters have expressed a willingness to pay for construction of a prison to deal with overcrowding in the state's prisons.

Oleen said voters also seem to support the idea of creating two smaller prisons to better separate criminals in the belief it will promote more effective rehabilitation of prisoners.

She has also worked to make clear that despite her membership in the Republican Party, she does not automatically support the goals of such state leaders as Gov. Mike Hayden — especially on the admission of Washburn University to the regents system.

Oleen said she has made it clear to Hayden and other state Republican leaders she is opposed to the addition of Washburn to the regents system.

"I've given my word on this," she said.

Admitting Washburn to the system would only draw funds from other regents schools, she said.

"We will not be in a financial situation to admit Washburn until we have K-State in competition with other comparable schools," Oleen said.

Oleen has said prisons and school finances are two of the most important issues to be faced by the Kansas Legislature when its session opens in January 1989.

Throughout the campaign, Oleen has stressed her experience in state government as a reason for area residents to vote for her.

Oleen said Democratic opponent Rod Olsen, a Manhattan attorney, has attempted to turn her support for Hayden into proof she will not keep her word on issues, especially the addition of Washburn.

"My word is sacred," she said.

Olsen stresses state census

By Erwin Seba
Senior Staff Writer

Rod Olsen, Democratic candidate for the 22nd State Senate District, said the state census has emerged as a very important issue to area voters.

Census officials did not count military personnel and students in Geary and Riley counties when they reported the results of the census.

Olsen said the decision to exclude students and military personnel excluded 20,000 residents from the area.

He said the state census should follow the guidelines of the federal census, conducted every 10 years.

"The federal census counts people where they live," Olsen said.

Olsen continued his criticism of Republican opponent Lana Oleen for what he called her close ties to Gov. Mike Hayden.

"Another issue that has concerned people throughout the district is that my opponent is so closely tied to Gov. Hayden," he said.

Oleen's ties are important because they may impair her ability to keep her promise to work against the inclusion of Washburn University in the regents system, Olsen said.

Hayden promised to work for Washburn's addition to the regents schools during his 1986 campaign for governor.

"It brings forth the question of what kind of pressure he will bring forth on the members of his political party from this district," Olsen said.

Earlier in the campaign, Olsen said adding Washburn to the eight regents institutions would diffuse the amount of money available to schools in the system.

Olsen has called for passage of the second year of the Margin of Excellence program.

In an earlier interview, Olsen said the regents universities were underfunded, compared to their peers in 1982 and 1983, and MOE will allow the universities parity with their peers.

"We just haven't caught up from those bad times," he said.

Representative Sand cites record in state Legislature

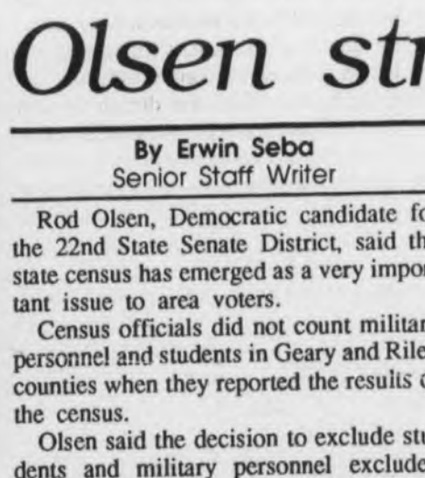
By Jenny Reschke
Collegian Reporter

Ivan Sand, who is seeking his seventh consecutive term as representative of the 66th District, cites his lengthy record in the Kansas Legislature as one of his main qualifications.

Sand has served on the Commercial and Financial Institutions Committee, the Pensions and Investments Committee and various interim committees.

This 70-year-old Riley County resident feels very strongly about the controversial issues facing the Kansas Legislature this year.

Sand said he stands firmly against the proposed addition of Washburn University to the Kansas regents system.



"I've always opposed it and I always will," Sand said. "I don't think we should be asked to bail out Washburn. They copied K-State's and KU's programs."

Of further interest to the future of higher education in Kansas is the variety of proposals for bringing all the state's community colleges under state control, he said.

"I think tighter control needs to be put on the community colleges to keep down duplication of courses and programs," Sand said. "At the present time, we aren't ready to bring them in yet. It's being studied now."

On the legislative district reapportionment issue, Sand is critical of the Hurt considers factors of highway proposal

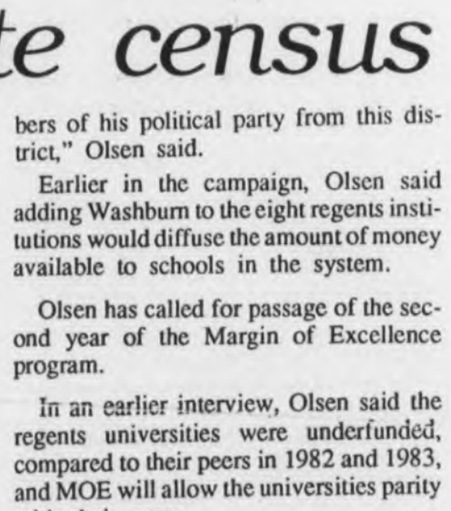
By Amy Rosebrough
Collegian Reporter

Although Katha Hurt lost the last election for state representative to the 66th District to Ivan Sand, she said she has gained the experience needed to win this election.



Hurt was born and raised in Kansas. She received her bachelor's degree from Fort Hays State University. In 1972, Hurt received her master's degree in elementary education from Kansas State University.

The basis of this campaign will be the "people issues," she said.

Hurt said she is for the state highway proposal, but there are three factors that must be considered. Her proposal is based on maintenance of the existing roads, ensuring user safety and a coherent division of economic funding.

As for Washburn University entering the Kansas Board of Regents, Hurt is against it. She said too many universities in the regents program are duplicating each others' programs.

"The system cannot afford to support what universities it has in the regents now," she said, "so there's no point in adding another."

Katha Hurt

Kansas tax codes need revision to match the federal tax codes, Hurt said. The state now has $300 million in reserve from taxes collected, and only $140 million is needed in the reserve fund. She said the surplus should be returned to the people through

Student loans needed

Slattery vies for third term

By Sarah Kobs
Collegian Reporter

After being first elected in 1982, Democrat Jim Slattery has represented 2nd District voters in the U.S. House of Representatives for three terms.

"Slattery began his political career in 1972 when he was elected as a representative to the Kansas Legislature. He served three terms and was the first Democrat in Kansas history to be elected as speaker protem," said Ken Murphy, press secretary for Slattery.

While in the House, he has served on the Budget Committee and the Energy and Commerce Committee, Murphy said. He has also served on several subcommittees.

Slattery emphasized his support of federal funding for student loans and scholarships.

"I attended college also, but without the help of a friendly Kansas banker, I wouldn't have been able to," he said. "I'm vigorously opposed to cuts in student loans and strongly support all government-funded programs, including Pell Grants and GSLs."

Slattery said it was a little known fact that the Reagan administration tried to cut student funding by 25 percent. Slattery fought the cuts when he was on the Budget Committee.

"The best interest of our country lies in the future," he said. "Educating the next generation will help the United States compete in a world-class economy."

As a member of the Budget Committee, Slattery said he has supported measures to strengthen the United States' ability to deal with unfair trade practices, expand the Trade Adjustment Assistance program for dislocated workers and provide a forum

Meinhardt promises smaller federal deficit

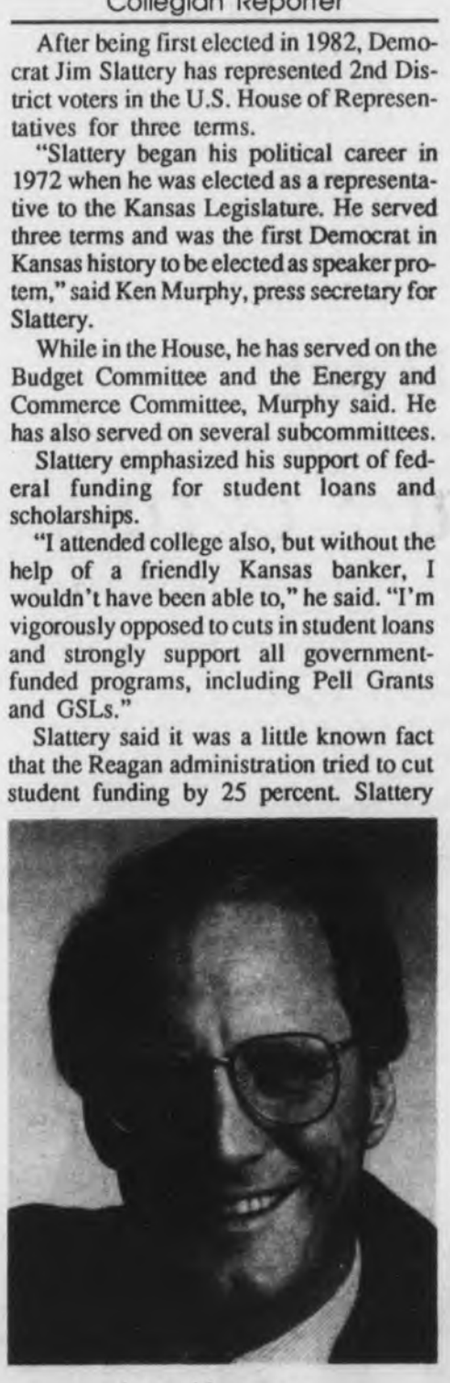
By Sarah Kobs
Collegian Reporter

Republican Phil Meinhardt, candidate for 2nd District representative in the U.S. House of Representatives, believes taxes are the biggest issue in the campaign against Democrat Jim Slattery.

"Slattery is clearly in favor of raising taxes, while I believe we should control government spending to reduce the deficit," he said.

"The federal budget could be balanced in two years if there is a freeze on government spending," he said. "The first priority should be improving efficiencies in the old programs before new programs are implemented."

Dennis Marten, Meinhardt's campaign director in Manhattan, said federally funded student loans and scholarships would be one of Meinhardt's top priorities once the deficit is reduced.



Meinhardt has had 34 years of experience in the Air Force and participated regularly in the economic policies of the military, said Glen Hanson, Meinhardt's campaign consultant. His military experience has given him a solid background in technology and government, Hanson said.

While he was in the Air Force, Meinhardt helped with three studies concerning the Strategic Defense Initiative. He supports a proposal by Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., for additional SDI research to acquire a limited shield, Meinhardt said.

Joe Knopp

House Majority Leader defends higher education voting record

By Susan L'Ecuyer
Senior Staff Writer

Although his voting record on higher education funding is being touted as detrimental to the interests of the majority of his constituents, Rep. Joe Knopp thinks otherwise.

"The people of this district know that I grew up in Kansas," Knopp said. "I know the importance of K-State to this state. I understand this campus."

He points to the fact that he supported a measure giving the regents 98.6 percent of "everything they asked for" last year. Knopp said he supports and has always supported "full funding" for the Kansas Board of Regents budget.

"Knowing what K-State means to this state, I'm going to be supporting full funding (again)," he said.

Knopp is defending his voting record on another issue of higher education, the question of whether Washburn should be included into the regents system.

"I have not supported and do not support Washburn coming in to the Board of Regents," Knopp said. He said he voted for bringing the funding of Washburn under state control because of his desire to "have some form of governance" over the proliferation of duplicated curricula among regents universities, Washburn and other community colleges.

Knopp said he believes a bill for a state highway program will be an issue again in the Legislature this year, and Knopp said he will "certainly" support it if it does.

"If Kansans won't invest in themselves, then nobody will," he said. "To me, it's an essential part of the economic development to the State of Kansas."

Knopp is opposed to the death penalty, but said he could support one that would only apply to contract killers, multiple or mass murderers and murderers of hostages, witnesses or prison guards.

Hochhauser: Economy depends on good, solid education system

By Susan L'Ecuyer
Senior Staff Writer

Stressing the results of a recent poll which indicated that Kansans view education as the No. 1 priority of the state, 67th District candidate Sheila Hochhauser believes a good economy depends on good education.

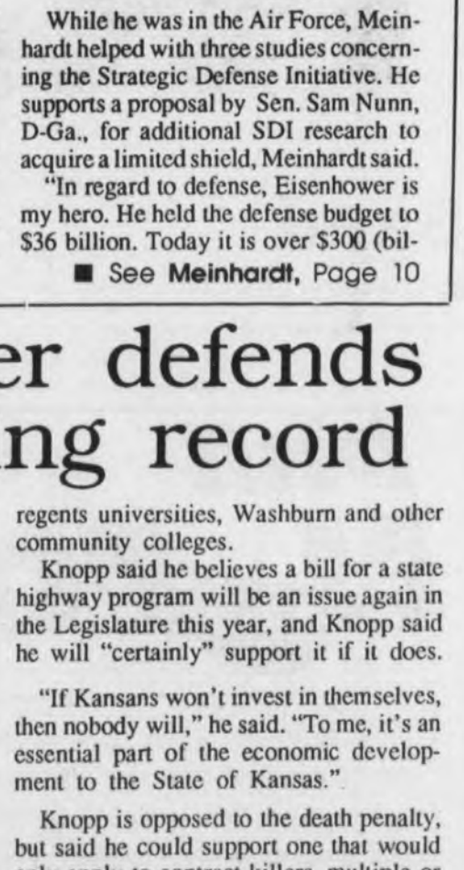
Although she is running against the incumbent Republican House majority leader, Joe Knopp, 67th District Democratic candidate Sheila Hochhauser is confident of her chances of winning.

Her strategy has been to emphasize Knopp's record.

Knopp voted against full funding for the Margin of Excellence plan and for increased state control over funding for Washburn, a move Hochhauser said is one of the major steps toward making Washburn part of the regents system.

Hochhauser is against the affiliation of Washburn with the regents system.

"Adding Washburn will clearly dilute whatever state funding is available," she said. "It is clearly a matter of finances.



Hochhauser said that in line with education, the state needs to look at the issue of child care.

"Kansas has ignored that issue," she said. "I think we should look at employers as another kind of benefit that employees can use."

With regard to developing and stimulating the Kansas economy, Hochhauser is in favor of developing the "indigenous business in rural Kansas."

"It is very difficult to attract outside business to small rural communities," she said. "We should encourage initiative among those committed to the communities of Kansas."

Hochhauser does favor improvements in Kansas highways, but "(doesn't) think that is where you start" to attract business to the state. She does not support a highway program as large as the $3 billion "pork barrel" one Knopp voted for in the Kansas House last year.

Training-Choices Program, which has helped 30,000 welfare recipients and saved the state of Massachusetts $140 million since 1983.

Dukakis opposes the Strategic Defense Initiative, Midgetman missiles and aid to the Contras. He supports women's rights on abortion and opposes capital punishment.

Throughout his campaign, Dukakis has unveiled several plans and proposals he would pursue if elected.

One such program is Investment in Education, Science and Technology, a program which Dukakis hopes will advance American economic independence by investing in technological and science education for everyone, especially young people.

The program is designed to set up Centers of Excellence to promote new technologies, Workplace 2000 Centers to train workers in new technology, a National Teaching Partnership and Science Education Development Projects for innovative science curricula.

Another program proposed by Dukakis is Saving Toward An Affordable Housing, which is aimed at young families trying to buy their first home.

If implemented, START will allow first-time homebuyers to invest IRA savings or tax-deferred pension plans for down payments on new homes. Also, by lowering the actual down payments and by raising the borrowing limits on federally guaranteed mortgages, the program is designed to make first-time homeownership more affordable.

And one more acronym for those who believe the education issue is an important one in this election: STARS, a Student Tuition and Repayment System intended by Dukakis to allow students to repay college loans through future payroll withholding.

One of two brothers, Dukakis attended Brookline High School, where he was voted "most brilliant" his senior year, and where he played trumpet in the band, was president of the Student Council and lettered in cross country, basketball and tennis. At the age of 17, he lied about his age by one year in order to enter the Boston Marathon. He finished 57th out of 191.

Dukakis attended Swarthmore College, from which he graduated with highest honors, and afterward served two years in the Army in Korea. In 1957, he attended Harvard Law School and his first official political experience started when he was elected to Brookline's Town Meeting. By 1962 — already a practicing lawyer — he was elected to the Massachusetts State House of Representatives.

ital gains and a taxpayers' bill of rights.

The platform also calls for a balanced budget through "a flexible freeze on government spending," as well as a balanced budget amendment to the Constitution and a line-item veto for the president.

Bush has said he wants to be known as "the education president." Among the education proposals in the platform is the call for a college savings bond program with tax-exempt interest.

Bush supports the re-establishment of the federal death penalty and has criticized Dukakis for a prisoner furlough program in Massachusetts.

Bush advocates a program of peace through strength to enable the United States to best deal with the Soviet Union. He supports further development of the Strategic Defense Initiative and has said he would deploy the system as soon as it became operational.

Meinhardt does not agree with his opponent's practice of accepting political honorariums for speeches he makes.

Marten said accepting political honorariums is not a good practice.

"Although Slattery does accept political honorariums, he donates 30 percent of it to charitable organizations," Murphy said. "He doesn't accept honorariums from Kansas constituents. The only payments he accepts are for speeches made outside of the state."

He said he will push for a program that rewards farmers who deliver high-quality, clean grain to the Commodity Credit Corporation.

"Farmers shouldn't lose the sale of even one bushel of grain because cleaner grain was available elsewhere," Slattery said.

This money could be used to help the community through social programs, community reform programs and other services to help the entire community, Hurt said.

Hurt is against the death penalty. She quoted statistics that state it is cheaper to house a criminal in prison than send him to death row. Statistics show poor minorities are the people who usually end up on death row, Hurt said. She agrees extremely violent criminals should pay for their crimes, but said there are other ways to deal with minor offense criminals.

Sand acknowledged the state's prison overcrowding situation.

Phil Nordhus
for President

K-State means a lot to us as students. Our campus is an educational structure that requires a comfortable atmosphere for our learning.
As Student Body President I would help make decisions that accommodate our diverse student body, and do my best to protect the student needs.
I've enjoyed being a part of Kansas State University, and look forward to seeing us continue bringing progress to our campus.
Thank You for letting me share in our experience.

Sincerely,
Phil Nordhus

District of Columbia — effectively putting his name before 18.8 percent of the voters in November.

Scanlon said of LaRouche, "If you had to put a label on him, I guess you would call him a conservative Democrat. He represents the views of the common guy, so I would say he's a mainstream Democrat."

Scanlon said LaRouche was denied access to media coverage at the national convention in Atlanta, and was excluded from the opinion polls and debates.

She said the Commission on Presidential Debates would not allow LaRouche to participate in the presidential debates because he doesn't get enough media coverage, but she said he doesn't have enough media coverage because he couldn't participate in the debates.

"I think it's indicative of the bias of the media when LaRouche has to buy time on national television in order to be heard," she said.

On Oct. 1, LaRouche appeared on national television to discuss what he called the "strategic food crisis" — the depletion of reserve stocks of grain, milk products, and livestock feeds.

Scanlon rejected the description of LaRouche as a "political extremist," which she said the media used "almost as a first name for LaRouche."

The LaRouche platform, "Mastering the Grave Crises of 1989-1992," calls for "radical change from the general direction of U.S. policies of the last 20 years."

According to the platform, in the coming years the world will experience "the most dangerous crisis in modern history," which will include a global financial crisis, a pandemic of old and new epidemic diseases and a worldwide collapse of industry, agriculture and basic economic infrastructure.

To combat the coming crises, LaRouche calls for:

■ Initiating major advanced-technology programs for air and water clean-up, large-scale forestation and improvements of waste and reserve land.

■ Transformation of the Federal Reserve System into what he calls a "Hamiltonian National Bank." LaRouche claims "Hamiltonian economics," the policies of the George Washington, James Monroe and Abraham Lincoln administrations, is what "built our nation into a major power," not the Adam Smith "free trade" policy of the Reagan Administration.

■ Three billion dollars a year for biological research to find a cure for AIDS in less than 10 years.

■ Universal AIDS testing and quarantine programs to slow the spread of AIDS.

■ Launch a super-NASA program with the long-range goal of permanent colonization of Mars by the year 2027.

According to the LaRouche platform, "The most dangerous feature of the present political situation is the likelihood that the U.S. government would react to breaking financial and economic crises of 1989 with drastic measures of austerity, continuing the terrible and often brutishly cruel failure which was the Gramm-Rudman legislation." LaRouche compares such measures to the political repression of Nazi Germany.

Paul

chances of winning an election or even getting on the ballot.

"The Republicans perceive the Libertarian Party as a direct threat to their constituency. As a result, they've fought tooth and toenail to throw obstacles in the way," Ernest said.

He said Republican Gov. Mike Hayden had promised to ease ballot requirements when he took office but that, in fact, they have become more restrictive.

He said one of the problems was that independent candidates in Kansas must gather 2,500 signatures for any office other than the Kansas Legislature, and they must do this 60 days before the Republican and Democratic conventions. He said this allows "a very short" time in which to gather signatures.

Ernest said the two major parties "don't have to meet these requirements, because they write the laws."

The Libertarian Party platform calls for adding a "none of the above" option to all ballots. The Libertarians argue that if "none of the above" wins a plurality of votes in an election, that elective office should not be occupied or funded for that term of office.

Other items on the 1988 Libertarian platform include:

■ Abolishing the Selective Service System. Denouncing conscription as "nothing less than slavery," the Libertarians claim it is also unconstitutional. The party also favors abolition of the Occupational Safety and Health Administration, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Central Intelligence Agency.

■ An end to compulsory education for children. Libertarians believe parents and children, rather than the government, should decide how much and what forms of education children should have.

■ Repealing the 16th Amendment which provides for "voluntary compliance" with a federal income tax. In a position paper, Paul states that the income tax reduces incentive to produce, violates personal and financial freedoms, and is necessary "only if we want to perpetuate the American Empire abroad and welfarism at home."

■ Decriminalizing drugs. Defending the "right of the people to ingest whatever they want," Paul favors abolition of the Food and Drug Administration and legalization of all drugs. Although Paul notes that he has been "active for more than 15 years in the anti-drug movement," he argues that the drug problem and the criminal elements associated with it can be confronted only by decriminalization, not more money for the "War on Drugs."

■ No restrictions on the Second Amendment. Calling regulations on gun dealers "despotic," Paul calls the right to bear arms "second only to our right to worship God as we choose."

According to Paul's position paper on defense, he favors a strong defense, including a "sufficient defensive nuclear arsenal." However, he does not favor foreign military intervention.

"Rather than enhancing our safety, defending the American Empire drains us of more than $200 billion every year, sacrifices our sons and reaps the hatred of both those we help and those we hurt," he said.

spoke directly to more people than did the major candidates. But on election day, most voters had never heard of them.

"Deprived of mass media coverage, a third party cannot reach the voting masses. Most people remain unaware not only of its candidates but of its programs, issues and critiques of status quo politics."

Many third-party and independent candidates claim news coverage and poor voter turnout have a cyclic effect. Without media coverage, voters do not take candidates seriously, and because voters do not take them seriously, the media refuse to cover them.

Rudin said exclusion of third parties from the major news media was not ideological. The main problem, he said, was not having enough time to do stories on third parties.

"You've got the two major parties, you've got the State Department and the Penatgon fighting to get on, and then you've got third parties. You just have to balance your time on what will serve the public, and we don't deem them as viable candidates," he said.

However, Parenti disagrees. He argues that television news is not designed to take political events, including elections, seriously.

"Although the network evening news has only a scant 22 minutes, it finds time for plenty of trivial or frivolous subjects that are clearly intended to entertain rather than inform. In five minutes, one could make devastating revelations and connections on any number of issues, but how often would a network news team attempt to do so?"

Robert McGilvray, news editor at the Wall Street Journal, said the Journal had given very little coverage to third parties because "they don't seem to be having an impact like John Anderson did in 1980."

However, a Sept. 3 Congressional Quarterly article argues that third parties in 1988 could play a significant role in the election.

The article claims "40,000 to 50,000 votes for Fulani in Illinois or New York might swing the state from Dukakis to Bush, just as a similar showing by Paul in Texas or California might push either state from Bush to Dukakis.

"In a race where one to two percentage points may be all that separate Bush and Dukakis in the final vote, third-party candidates could end up playing a small but critical role in determining the next president."

Fulani

New Alliance Party, which describes itself as the ideological heir to the Rainbow Coalition.

Roboff said the New Alliance Party is "a second road for those in the Rainbow Coalition who want to see their agenda realized."

Fulani will not carry a party label in Kansas, in part because Kansas election laws make it easier for independent candidates to get on the ballot than for third-party candidates, Roboff said.

Another reason is a Kansas law which would prohibit the New Alliance Party from being on the ballot. The law, passed in 1901, requires political parties to limit their names to two words, one of which must be "party," such as Republican Party, Democratic Party or Socialist Party.

Much of Fulani's campaign centers on the ballot access restrictions affecting third-party and independent candidates. In a June 24, 1987, speech announcing her candidacy, Fulani said, "There is no more pressing issue in this country today than the issue of fair elections.

"This is why this campaign must and will challenge — at every step of the way — restrictions on democracy and debate and limits to the participatory process, at the same time that we raise the policy issues that have been shut out of the national arena by the anti-democratic character of U.S. elections."

She also said that lack of choice characterized U.S. presidential elections.

"When it comes time to cast their votes for the President of United States, there are only two choices," Fulani said. "A Democrat or a Republican, whose parties have endorsed and initiated racial violence from the shores of Tripoli to the streets of Howard Beach."

Fulani said the two major parties have "demonstrated a bipartisan commitment to militarism and genocide against people of color around the globe," and "a bipartisan loyalty to white corporate America, to the rich, the very rich and the ultra rich."

She argues bipartisan support for reducing the budget deficit is "a fancy term for making the poor pay for the failure of this economic system."

Fulani stands for:

- Farm subsidies and a national moratorium on farm foreclosures.
- A national health service guaranteeing health care for all.
- Enforcement of Native American treaty rights.

Warren

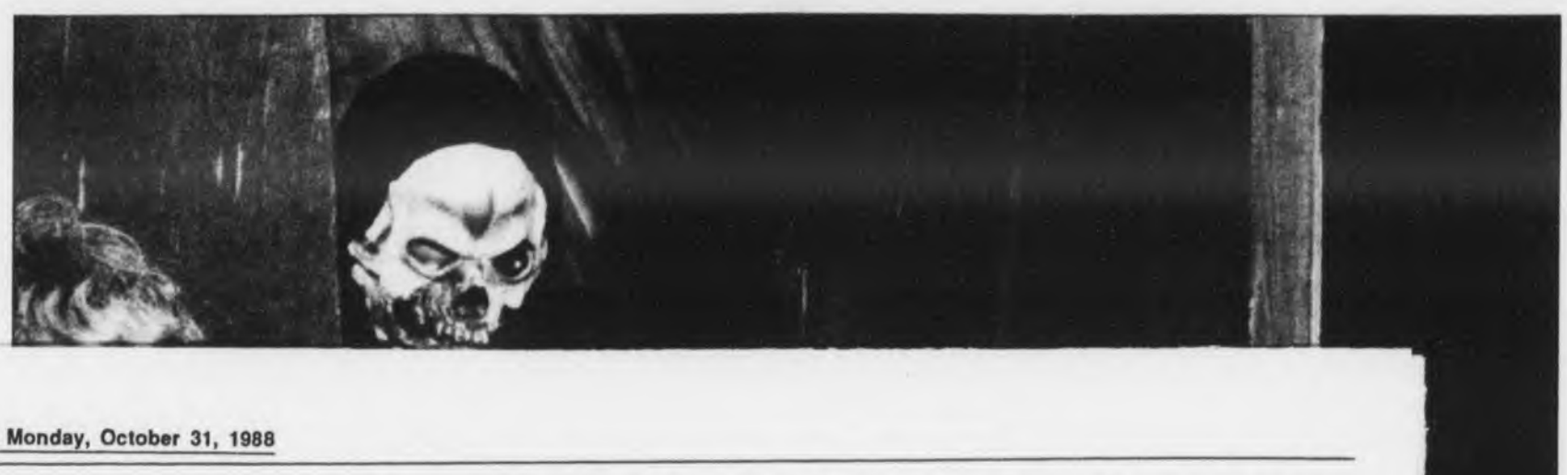
and both have worked for various worker struggles, including the Hormel meatpackers strike of 1986 in Austin, Minn.

The 1988 SWP platform centers around what the SWP National Committee calls the "coming economic crisis." The Sept. 30 Militant quotes Warren: "The Democratic and Republican candidates don't talk about this, because they have no solution, no confidence in what to say or do.

"We explain to workers we talk with that we can't look at the world starting with ourselves, or our plant, or our job. For example, we can't wait until we go out on strike to think about the people we need to defend us. Some understand this now; later others will, too."

The 1988 SWP platform calls for federal legislation to reduce the workweek to 30 hours with no reduction in pay.



"If the workweek was shortened," the SWP argues, "that would immediately open up the possibility of jobs for millions of workers.

"Working people are not responsible for inflation, any more than we're to blame for unemployment. Joblessness and rising prices result from the ceaseless competition for profits. That is the heartbeat of the capitalist system."

Along with the 30-hour workweek, the SWP wants:

- Automatic cost of living adjustments in the wages for all public employees.
- Pensions, welfare, unemployment and Social Security payments.
- Cost of living protection in all union contracts and for all workers in every plant and workplace.

It would also "enforce quotas to guarantee that blacks and other victims of race and national discrimination be given preference in college admission, loans and housing," and "enforce busing to desegregate schools in order to provide equal education opportunities to students who are black or Latino."

Inmate charged in murder case

From Staff and Wire Reports

It has been almost 10 years since Tracey Miller was raped and murdered in Manhattan. Until Monday, no one had been charged in the case.

New evidence has prompted the Riley County Police Department and the Kansas Bureau of Investigation to charge a Missouri inmate on death row with the rape and murder of Miller, who was killed Nov. 2, 1978.

Anthony Joe LaRette, Topeka, has been charged with first degree murder, felony murder, aggravated burglary and rape in the Miller case. District Judge Jerry Mershon set LaRette's bail at $1 million.

LaRette, 37, is being held pending execution in the Missouri State Penitentiary in Jefferson City for the 1980 murder of a woman in St. Charles, Mo., said Col. Les Bieler of the RCPD.

Alvan Johnson, RCPD director, said Riley County Police and Kansas Bureau of Investigation officers charged LaRette Monday based on evidence found Thursday. He said LaRette had been suspected in the crime but Johnson did not disclose for how long.

"It has been 18 years since Missouri has executed someone, so we want to extradite him and prosecute in Manhattan," Johnson said Monday at a press conference.

Riley County authorities worked with Missouri authorities on the case that resulted in LaRette receiving the death penalty. Johnson said details of that incident were similar to Miller's killing, and Riley County authorities hoped the Missouri case information would help their investigation.

LaRette was transferred to death row in Jefferson City, Mo., after his conviction for the death of Mary A. Fleming, 18, in an apartment which she shared with her mother and sister.

Fleming was stabbed several times and also was sexually molested.

RCPD investigators questioned LaRette following his Missouri trial because of the similarities between the two cases.

County Attorney Bill Kennedy said details concerning new and past evidence cannot be disclosed at pre-

Candidates run on party ticket

For the first time in three years, a political party has registered in student government elections.

Students for Educational Awareness is a "revitalized" party whose purpose is "to get students aware of what is going on in the University and how what we do inside the University affects what goes on outside," said Paige Nichols, senior in philosophy and SEA member.

In the 1986-87 elections, a group of students ran for offices under the SEA platform, including one candidate for president, who was not elected, and various senatorial candidates.

At the time, the issue of importance was student contributions to Bramlage Coliseum.

Two issues the new SEA are concerned with are the divestment of student monies from companies doing business in South Africa and the unequal representation in Student Senate, Nichols said.

"We want people to question what is going on right now (with representation) and help us formulate a better alternative," she said.

There are two SEA senatorial candidates and one SEA presidential candidate.

Sally Howard-Clayton, senior in humanities, is the SEA presidential candidate. The candidates for Senate are Jenny Bell, junior in political science, and Jim Jesik, sophomore in environmental design. Rattan Nath, graduate student in physics, also may run.

Nichols said the only requirement for membership in SEA is attendance at meetings, which are open to

Manhattan streets fill with goblins

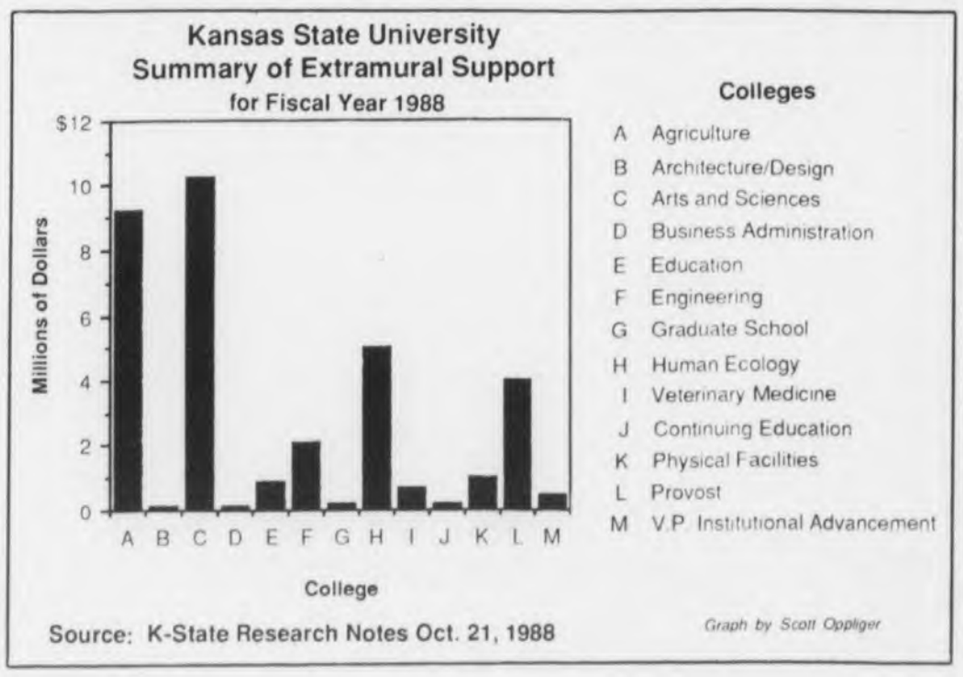
By Theresa Luling
Collegian Reporter

Trick-or-treaters were out walking the streets of Manhattan in full force and full costume Monday night. From dark corners and bushes came clowns, witches and gypsies determined to reap bags of tasty morsels.

Manhattan residents and store owners were in the Halloween spirit as well, giving away treats to all those who stopped by.

"For the past 10 years I have been here, we have passed out candy to trick-or-treaters," said Jeff Dumler, pharmacist at Revco. "This year we had a few employees who dressed up and handed out the candy."

Bruce Hoyle, operations manager for Wal-Mart, said if Halloween candy is left on the shelves, the store would give it away.



K-Mart took part in the evening by passing out candy to all the kids in costume who entered the store, said Beth Cochran, service desk clerk.

Parents who were concerned about the goodies their children brought home could find help at area hospitals. The Saint Mary Hospital and Memorial Hospital both offered free X-ray services to check the food received.

The Saint Mary Hospital also will do this today from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m., said Linda McCann, house supervisor.

Manhattan not only celebrated Halloween Monday night, but also Saturday evening. Retailers in Manhattan Town Center showed their Halloween spirit early, handing out candy to trick-or-treaters who showed up during the evening.

Graduate School reports record funding

Editor's note: This is the first of a three-part series on the Graduate School.

K-State's Graduate School has been substantially behind its peers in number of students and in funding in the past years, but that may start to change with the record increase in extramural support, some administrators are saying.

Extramural support is non-University, non-appropriated funding that individual faculty members receive from petitioning and lobbying outside sources. Sources include such organizations as the American Medical Association and corporations which provide grants for research or sponsored programs.

More outside support for faculty means more graduate student support. More money could mean more graduate students, said Paul Lowe, accountant in the Division of Biology.

Only about 25 percent of K-State's graduate students are supported through extramural funding. But all graduate students get indirect support because the money is distributed among public services, facilities and research and development.

K-State increased its extramural support from $21.9 million in fiscal 1987 to $28.8 million in 1988. In the four-year period since 1984, annual extramural support for research and other sponsored programs has nearly doubled.

The single-year increase of 31.5 percent is credited to faculty in all departments who believe in what they are doing and have the drive and perseverance to see it through, said Robert P. Lowman, associate dean of the Graduate School.

"(Pursuing extramural support) is an intensely personal, almost entrepreneurial, activity," Lowman said. "They're selling their ideas."

Of the $28.8 million in extramural support, $19.4 million was for research, $2.7 million was for instructional projects and $2.4 million was for public service projects. The remaining $4.2 million was for other projects, with most going for construction costs of the Educational Communications Center.

"Of the $6.9 million increase, $4.2 million is for the Educational Communications Center," said Lowman. "But (the extramural increase) would still be a 15 percent increase without the center and that is still well above the rate of growth."

"The newer equipment helps you," said Tim Nelson, graduate student in chemistry. "For example, a new computer helps get your work done faster, but it won't affect my take-home pay."

In the College of Arts and Sciences, extramural support increased nearly 58 percent from 1987 and the college broke the $10 million barrier for the first time in its history, Lowman said. About 90 percent of the col-

Walesa 'infuriated' by closing

WARSAW, Poland — An infuriated Lech Walesa vowed Monday to fight government plans to close down the Lenin shipyard, the site where the Solidarity trade union was born.

The state-owned shipyard in Gdansk is being closed down Dec. 1. It is the first big industrial plant to be singled out for closure by the month-old government of Prime Minister Mieczyslaw F. Rakowski, who has pledged to get rid of unproductive and inefficient enterprises.

The decision was announced while the shipyard was closed on the eve of All Saints' Day and caught many workers and Solidarity activists by surprise. The yard reopens Wednesday.

Birds search Britain for food

LONDON — Scores of birds known as waxwings have arrived along the east coast of Britain, and an expert says they came from the Soviet Union in search of food.

Christopher Mead, a bird specialist with the British Trust for Ornithology, said the waxwings seen on Sunday don't usually migrate to Britain and came because of a sparse crop of the berries on which they survive.

Waxwings, which get their name from the red color at the tips of their wings, were last seen in large numbers in Britain in the 1960s.

Officials reported about 100 waxwings were first seen a week ago in the Orkney and Shetland islands off the north coast of Scotland.

Countries to reduce pollution

SOFIA, Bulgaria — Twelve countries Monday signed a declaration to reduce emissions of air pollutants that contribute to acid rain and the depletion of the ozone layer.

The countries that promised to reduce by 30 percent their emissions of nitrogen oxide in the next 10 years are Finland, Norway, Belgium, Italy, France, Austria, Switzerland, Sweden, West Germany, Liechtenstein, Denmark and the Netherlands.

Nitrogen oxide, derived mostly from car exhaust fumes and the burning of fossil fuels, contributes to smog, acid rain and the "greenhouse effect," or the warming of the atmosphere around Earth.

The 12 members of the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe were in Sofia for a meeting of the Convention on Long-range Transboundary Air Pollution that begins Tuesday.

Freed whales win award

MIAMI — The Procrastinators Club of America issued its top award to the California gray whales that dallied so long off the coast of Alaska after they became stuck in ice, a club official said Monday.

"They exemplify the highest standard of procrastination," said Joseph Weiss of North Bay Village, the club's secretary-treasurer. "They waited until the last minute to go down to their spawning grounds."

The Philadelphia-based club has not yet decided what the prize will be or when and how it will be awarded, Weiss said.

"Their award will be sometime in the future — we have to have a lot of meetings first," he explained.

The two whales, whose plight attracted attention worldwide, are believed to have finally escaped their icy prison near Barrow last week after two Soviet icebreakers cut a path for them to open water.

Marcos gives innocent plea

NEW YORK — Imelda Marcos pleaded innocent Monday to racketeering charges for allegedly helping her husband, deposed Philippine President Ferdinand Marcos, plunder $100 million from their country's treasury.

U.S. District Judge John F. Keenan set bail for Imelda Marcos at $5 million and said she could not return to Hawaii and her ailing husband until details of the bond are worked out.

Marcos, 59, famous for her opulent lifestyle as first lady of the Philippines, arrived at the federal courthouse by limousine, accompanied by an entourage of at least a dozen people.

She wore a full-length, chiffon aquamarine gown with traditional Filipino butterfly sleeves, pearl earrings and black pumps, and her queenly appearance stunned the crowded courtroom into silence.

Marcos later found herself blinking back tears when the judge refused to allow her to return right away to Hawaii, where she and her 71-year-old husband have lived since he was forced out of the Philippines in February 1986.

"I'm not going to let the lady go back to the Hawaiian Islands until I'm certain the bail is set," Keenan said as a glum Imelda Marcos brushed away a tear.

He ordered her to return to court Thursday with her lawyers if they had not worked out a bail package by then with prosecutors.

Holiday foils robbery attempt

KNOXVILLE, Tenn. — An apparent robbery attempt fizzled when a motel clerk assumed a gunman was merely decked out for Halloween and refused to take him seriously, a sheriff's spokesman said Monday.

A man wearing an olive green ski mask and carrying a .410-gauge shotgun walked into a Scottish Inn lobby in Knoxville on Sunday, said Art Miller, Knox County Sheriff's spokesman.

The clerk and another man had been talking, glanced at the gunman, and continued their conversation.

Finally one of the men asked the gunman if he was going to rob the motel, and the masked man said he wanted money, said Sheriff's Detective Carl Seider.

The masked man then pumped a shell into the shotgun chamber, Seider said. The man who had been talking to the clerk then pretended to reach for a gun in his waistband, and the gunman fled.

Student wounded with gun

GREAT BEND — A high school student's attempt to do a good deed for his biology class taught him a painful lesson when he was shot in the leg with a 12-gauge shotgun.

Mark Erb, 18, of Great Bend, was hunting with a friend Sunday when the two spotted a large snake in the road, said Erb's mother, Beverley Erb.

Erb and Korey Burkhart, 17, decided to try to capture the snake to take to class at Great Bend High School.

When Burkhart jumped out of the pickup truck the two were in, he pulled a vest out of the bed of the truck. Unfortunately, the youths' shotguns were on top of the vest, and Erb's went off as it dropped back into the truck.

The pellets went through the back end of the pickup truck, through the truck seat and struck Erb above the right knee. He had about 75 lead pellets embedded in his leg.

"He's lucky he was kneeling, and not sitting," she said. "And he was lucky the pickup caught the brunt of it."

A doctor at Hoisington Lutheran Hospital told Mrs. Erb that although the pellets embedded themselves above her son's knee, X-rays showed no bone damage.

Correction

Student body presidential candidates Scott King and Mike Cormaci were misquoted in an article in Monday's Collegian about the presidential debate.

Cormaci said applying for and receiving financial aid is the most pressing problem facing K-Staters today.

"It could be a more efficient process," he said.

King said the continual idea of initiating student fees is the most pressing issue. He also said he believes there needs to be more student involvement as to how fees are spent.

Kansas City crowd entertained by Bush

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — George Bush, fighting to gain an edge in Missouri, entertained an after-work crowd Monday with music, athletic stars and a few shots at Democratic opponent Michael Dukakis.

The Republican presidential nominee spoke to about 400 people under a tent outside Crown Center in downtown Kansas City, where Hallmark Cards Inc. has its headquarters. Hundreds of other supporters listened outside the tent as the Gatlin Brothers country band sang songs before Bush appeared.

"Here we are at Hallmark," Bush told the crowd. "And you're going to go into that voting booth in eight days and vote for me, if you care to send the very best."

The vice president, who was introduced by Kansas City Royals star George Brett, repeated pledges he's made throughout his campaign not to raise taxes and to become "the education president."

He ridiculed Dukakis for calling himself a liberal, as the Democrat did in California over the weekend.

"And he's been criticizing me for calling him a liberal," Bush said, adding that the Massachusetts governor doesn't have a chance to win the election.

"He can't get elected unless things get worse, but things won't get worse unless he's elected," Bush said.

Earlier Monday in St. Louis, Bush said his task for the remainder of the presidential campaign is similar to a St. Louis Cardinals relief pitcher whose job is to come in late and secure victory.

"I'm going to keep pitching like Todd Worrell — and that's what's going to get me in there — right down to Nov. 8," Bush said to thousands of supporters outside Union Station near downtown St. Louis.

Recent polls show he has commanding leads in crucial states but has slipped in some states, including Missouri.

Missouri has only 11 electoral votes, but Bush has made several appearances in the state, saying he considers it to be vital. In all but one presidential election since 1904, Missouri voters have gone for the victorious candidate.

Grant benefits welfare recipients

By Heather Huntington
Collegian Reporter

Mothers receiving welfare may have the opportunity to become more economically independent through Kansas Child Care Training Opportunities Inc.

KCCTO, a non-profit organization in the Family Center of the College of Human Ecology, will use a grant of more than $181,000 from the Kansas Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services to help organize the statewide KANWORK program.

"The KANWORK program will provide job training and placement, day care, transportation, and medical care to help the mothers become productive members of the work force," said Mary Dean Apel, assistant professor of human development and family studies and associate director for the KCCTO.

KANWORK was set up to encourage mothers dependent on welfare to get job training and to provide child care for other mothers who need to work, said Rep. Joe Knopp, Kansas House majority leader.

Historically, a cycle has developed for those who are unemployed and on welfare, Knopp said. A person can't afford to work and pay for child care, so the incentive is to stay home and continue to receive money from welfare programs.

"The program is giving people the ability to break the cycle," he said.

KANWORK began this year as a pilot program with only Barton, Finney, Sedgwick and Shawnee counties participating, Knopp said.

These counties were chosen because they vary socially and economically, he said.

"We expect the program to work best where there's a large labor pool," Knopp said. "Doing child care where the mother doesn't have a place to work isn't going to be very productive."

Those who qualify for the program may also apply for a $500 home improvement grant with which they can purchase fire extinguishers, guard gates, handrails and other items to help meet home care licensing requirements, Apel said.

The grant received by K-State will be used to pay salaries, to purchase training material and to coordinate training sessions, said Steve Bollman, director of the family center.

Those chosen for the program will also be required to complete 120 hours of training. The training involves 10 hours of instruction on 12 topics ranging from child development to safety and health, he said.

In addition, those chosen for the program may apply for a type of national child-care certification. KCCTO grant money will be used to pay for the registration and for the licensing fee for the certification. While the trainees attend classes, their children will be provided with care by licensed child-care workers.

"It's a tremendous challenge to get people into training and get them out of poverty," Bollman said. "It's something people have been trying to do for a couple of decades."

The College of Human Ecology has been home to the KCCTO for two years, Apel said.

"Child-care providers and others interested in child care saw a need to improve child care and form this organization to provide trainers."

Court to review executive authority

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court on Monday stepped into a simmering feud between Congress and President Reagan by agreeing to review legislation limiting presidential authority to withhold classified information.

The justices, in a case to be decided by July, agreed to consider reviving a "whistleblower" law decreed unconstitutional by a lower court. The legislation was designed to restrain the president's ability to keep national security information from Congress.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who had breast cancer surgery 10 days ago at Georgetown University Hospital, was back on the bench as she and her fellow justices returned from a two-week recess.

O'Connor, 58, who reportedly had a breast removed, previously said the cancer was detected in an early stage and the prognosis is for a full recovery.

In other action, the court:

- Killed a lawsuit against the government stemming from the World War II mass detention of Japanese-Americans in U.S. prison camps. The action bars a suit for property losses by veterans of the internment camps, but legislation was enacted this year that permits each detainee to receive $20,000.
- Agreed in a case from Virginia to decide whether states must continue to provide lawyers for indigent death row inmates after they have lost their initial round of appeals.
- Ruled, 7-2, that police in Pennsylvania did not violate the rights of a man suspected of drunken driving when they failed to read him so-called Miranda warnings when he was stopped for questioning.
- Let stand an Illinois law that bans the possession of child pornography.

Dukakis endorsed for U.S. president

The Collegian endorses Gov. Michael Dukakis for president of the United States.

In a made-for-television campaign, grave issues confronting America have been ignored by both Dukakis and Vice President George Bush as they used symbols to define clear images of themselves in the voters' minds.

Yet, these issues should not be ignored by voters when casting their ballots. One such issue is the course of the Supreme Court under the next president.

President Reagan, despite claims to the contrary, has applied an ideological litmus test when considering individuals for appointment to the Court.

Those, like Robert Bork, who passed the test have been followers of the doctrine of original intent. This doctrine maintains judges should be guided by the intentions of the framers as written in the language of the Constitution when ruling on the constitutionality of laws.

Such long-standing rights as the right to privacy, which protects citizens from the intrusion of a powerful government and a powerful media and is not clearly stated in the Constitution, would be stripped away if the original intent doctrine is followed.

Bush has made clear he will continue to use the same ideological test as Reagan when making appointments to the Court.

In three terms as governor, Dukakis has appointed conservatives as well as moderates and liberals to be judges in Massachusetts.

Dukakis has said he will ensure that the Supreme Court and the lower federal courts have the ideological balance appropriate for such national institutions. And Dukakis has promised to place the power of the executive branch on the side of individual rights.

While he has not always taken the high road throughout the campaign, Dukakis has not shown the same depth of contempt for the American voter as Bush has displayed with his appeals to jingoistic nationalism.

For these reasons, the Collegian endorses Dukakis for the presidency.

Howard-Clayton picked to lead student body

This year is the first time in recent history, and possibly ever, in which the Collegian editorial board has decided to endorse a candidate for student body president.

For student body president, the Collegian endorses Sally Howard-Clayton. A former student senator, Howard-Clayton knows how student government is run. For that very reason, she has campaigned on promises to change it.

While many of the other candidates have talked about getting students involved, Howard-Clayton has done more than talk — she has devised a plan.

Howard-Clayton proposes allowing students to vote by political parties, instead of simply by college. She has pointed out that ideology plays at least as important a role in how senators vote as the role the college a senator represents plays.

Practicing what she preaches, Howard-Clayton is herself the candidate of a political party — Students for Educational Awareness.

Howard-Clayton's plan simply makes good sense. Students are concerned with issues that affect them. Why should they not vote that way?

She cites a Student Senate study indicating that senators vote not by college but by ideology. Indeed, trying to advance one's college at the expense of other colleges would be a curious way for a senator to vote. Such college chauvinism, if it ever was a factor in student government, now seems a thing of the past. As such, it should be relegated to the dustbin of history.

Howard-Clayton also favors a policy of ethical University investments, including removing student money from companies doing business in South Africa. But her position goes beyond just the issue of South Africa by also asking that the University look at how its investments affect other important issues, such as the environment.

While personally opposed to an athletic fee, she suggests the KSU Athletic Department be carefully scrutinized before the student body grants future funding. As a precedent, she points out that the KSU Childcare Cooperative, which she favors, was looked into extensively last year before it received student money. Knowing what students are paying for makes good business sense, she argues.

For her innovation and experience, Howard-Clayton has earned the endorsement of the Collegian.

Collegian Editorial Policies

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR are always encouraged. Those which pertain to matters of campus and/or public interest are especially encouraged, and are given the highest priority.

Letters should be kept as brief as possible, preferably under 300 words. Those who cannot condense their opinions should consider submiting their letter in the form of a guest column. All letters are subject to editing for space, style and taste.

GUEST COLUMNS are also encouraged. The column should be no longer than two double-spaced, typed pages. If the submission is used as a column and not a letter to the editor, it will be accompanied by the author's photograph.

SEND SUBMISSIONS to the Collegian in Kedzie 116.

UNSIGNED EDITORIALS represent the consensus opinion of the Collegian's editorial board. Opinion columns do not necessarily reflect the opinions of the Collegian management, Student Publications, Inc. or the newspaper staff in general.

3 qualifications necessary for student body president

Commentary

MARK SCHMELLER
Collegian Columnist

I love a good debate. Fiery arguments, angry accusations, fingers pointing, spit flying — I love it all.

Naturally, I didn't expect to witness such a spectacle at the Union Program Council student body presidential debate Sunday night. With nine of the 11 candidates present, the affair naturally turned into the sort of multiloop press conference that national presidential debates have become.

Nonetheless, I really got a good deal out of the 1½ hours I could stomach. For one thing, I found out that it takes three things to be a student body presidential candidate.

First, one must be proficient in the vague, banal, noncommital doublespeak that so many university administrators seem to possess. One must be able to turn phrases like "broader understanding of needs," "that's a legitimate concern," "need for better communication," "work with the students," and "a task force to examine needs" as if it were second nature.

Second, one must be able to keep a straight face and maintain absolute sincerity when confronted with impossible, goofy UPC questions like, "Use three words to describe what K-State has to offer," or "How would you define the typical K-Stater?" Such questions are bound to provoke bland, sugarcoated, nonsensical answers from even the most thoughtful of candidates. Nonetheless, one must deliver them with cocksure conviction.

"Vision — that's my word," said candidate Laurian Cuffy, senior in management.

"K-State has pride," said candidate Phil Kirk, senior in agricultural economics. "Go to Bramlage Coliseum and look at all the purple seats."

But the real screamer of the night was served up by candidate Tom Jones. When asked where he would take a prospective K-Stater (obvious answer — Aggieville), Jones said he would take the possible student to Ahearn, then the new $13.5 million Bramlage Coliseum and finally to Farrell Library, imploring the student to imagine what $13.5 million could have done for it. Big laughs all around.

I guess you had to be there.

Third, the most important qualification for the job of student body president seems to be the ability to stress "more student involvement" and "strong leadership" in the same breath, managing to avoid the often contradictory natures of the two. Or do the candidates seriously believe they can make everyone a part of the process and still control it with clarity and consistency? To me, greater involvement seems to mean a wider diversity of approaches and priorities. Leadership is the ability to act even-handedly and decisively. Such leadership can't be carried out with so many cooks spoiling the broth.

Futhermore, the stress on "greater student involvement" is rarely accompanied with any formative plans for doing so. More student involvement will be accomplished by involving more students, most of the candidates seem to be saying. One rare exception was candidate Sally Howard-Clayton, who proposed the formation of political parties as a means of increasing involvement. It was one of the few interesting ideas presented during the evening.

I don't question any of the candidates' concern for student involvement. What I do question is the idea of concern over student involvement. Is it really all that important to the the student body that the president is willing to bend over backwards for them, to let them run the show, to sit on committees and to make speeches to Student Senate? Isn't it more important to have someone who knows the right direction and doesn't feel the need to run a student government by referendum and task force?

In many ways, student government mirrors real government. Students at K-State aren't more visionary or motivated or full of pride than anyone else out there in the real world. And in the real world, people want the government off of their backs. They want a leader they can believe in, but they also want one who will leave them alone. People don't know exactly what they want, but they know what they don't want. With jury duty and other civic duties as detested as they are in this country, does anyone expect students to be crawling over each other to work on a student lobbying task force or get into the SGA offices?

Of course it would be better if students were more involved. But students are simply too busy or have too many other interests to sit around and haggle over per diem allocations, parking regulations or $10 fees. Leave that to the student government, say we, the silent majority of students. After all, senators are the ones who can put it down on their resumes.

Nonetheless, student awareness could be improved. Compared to many other peer schools, the K-State student government wields some real power and has a good say in how the University is run. But student awareness cannot be achieved simply by trying to involve everyone. So why all the talk about involvement when, year after year, it becomes apparent, after tireless attempts, that most students just don't want to get involved, or that there are barriers preventing interested persons from getting involved? Why not try to change the system, as Howard-Clayton has suggested, to see if a desire for student involvement actually exists and can work? Or could we just cut out all the wishful thinking and metaphysical solutions to the perceived problem and let the presidents run things?

Student awareness would be better served by a president more willing to stick his or her neck out than one who floats adrift in a sea of "greater student involvement." This is not to suggest that "If I'm elected president, you can go screw yourself" would be a good campaign slogan, but it would certainly increase student awareness, opening up things to some much-needed attention.

Kansas City crowd entertained by Bush

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — George Bush, fighting to gain an edge in Missouri, entertained an after-work crowd Monday with music, athletic stars and a few shots at Democratic opponent Michael Dukakis.

The Republican presidential nominee spoke to about 400 people under a tent outside Crown Center in downtown Kansas City, where Hallmark Cards Inc. has its headquarters. Hundreds of other supporters listened outside the tent as the Gatlin Brothers country band sang songs before Bush appeared.

"Here we are at Hallmark," Bush told the crowd. "And you're going to go into that voting booth in eight days and vote for me, if you care to send the very best."

The vice president, who was introduced by Kansas City Royals star George Brett, repeated pledges he's made throughout his campaign not to raise taxes and to become "the education president."

He ridiculed Dukakis for calling himself a liberal, as the Democrat did in California over the weekend.

"And he's been criticizing me for calling him a liberal," Bush said, adding that the Massachusetts governor doesn't have a chance to win the election.

"He can't get elected unless things get worse, but things won't get worse unless he's elected," Bush said.

Earlier Monday in St. Louis, Bush said his task for the remainder of the presidential campaign is similar to a St. Louis Cardinals relief pitcher whose job is to come in late and secure victory.

"I'm going to keep pitching like Todd Worrell — and that's what's going to get me in there — right down to Nov. 8," Bush said to thousands of supporters outside Union Station near downtown St. Louis.

Recent polls show he has commanding leads in crucial states but has slipped in some states, including Missouri.

Missouri has only 11 electoral votes, but Bush has made several appearances in the state, saying he considers it to be vital. In all but one presidential election since 1904, Missouri voters have gone for the victorious candidate.

Grant benefits welfare recipients

By Heather Huntington
Collegian Reporter

Mothers receiving welfare may have the opportunity to become more economically independent through Kansas Child Care Training Opportunities Inc.

KCCTO, a non-profit organization in the Family Center of the College of Human Ecology, will use a grant of more than $181,000 from the Kansas Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services to help organize the statewide KANWORK program.

"The KANWORK program will provide job training and placement, day care, transportation, and medical care to help the mothers become productive members of the work force," said Mary Dean Apel, assistant professor of human development and family studies and associate director for the KCCTO.

KANWORK was set up to encourage mothers dependent on welfare to get job training and to provide child care for other mothers who need to work, said Rep. Joe Knopp, Kansas House majority leader.

Historically, a cycle has developed for those who are unemployed and on welfare, Knopp said. A person can't afford to work and pay for child care, so the incentive is to stay home and continue to receive money from welfare programs.

"The program is giving people the ability to break the cycle," he said.

KANWORK began this year as a pilot program with only Barton, Finney, Sedgwick and Shawnee counties participating, Knopp said.

These counties were chosen because they vary socially and economically, he said.

"We expect the program to work best where there's a large labor pool," Knopp said. "Doing child care where the mother doesn't have a place to work isn't going to be very productive."

Those who qualify for the program may also apply for a $500 home improvement grant with which they can purchase fire extinguishers, guard gates, handrails and other items to help meet home care licensing requirements, Apel said.

The grant received by K-State will be used to pay salaries, to purchase training material and to coordinate training sessions, said Steve Bollman, director of the family center.

Those chosen for the program will also be required to complete 120 hours of training. The training involves 10 hours of instruction on 12 topics ranging from child development to safety and health, he said.

In addition, those chosen for the program may apply for a type of national child-care certification. KCCTO grant money will be used to pay for the registration and for the licensing fee for the certification. While the trainees attend classes, their children will be provided with care by licensed child-care workers.

"It's a tremendous challenge to get people into training and get them out of poverty," Bollman said. "It's something people have been trying to do for a couple of decades."

The College of Human Ecology has been home to the KCCTO for two years, Apel said.

"Child-care providers and others interested in child care saw a need to improve child care and form this organization to provide trainers."

Court to review executive authority

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court on Monday stepped into a simmering feud between Congress and President Reagan by agreeing to review legislation limiting presidential authority to withhold classified information.

The justices, in a case to be decided by July, agreed to consider reviving a "whistleblower" law decreed unconstitutional by a lower court. The legislation was designed to restrain the president's ability to keep national security information from Congress.

Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who had breast cancer surgery 10 days ago at Georgetown University Hospital, was back on the bench as she and her fellow justices returned from a two-week recess.

O'Connor, 58, who reportedly had a breast removed, previously said the cancer was detected in an early stage and the prognosis is for a full recovery.

In other action, the court:

- Killed a lawsuit against the government stemming from the World War II mass detention of Japanese-Americans in U.S. prison camps. The action bars a suit for property losses by veterans of the internment camps, but legislation was enacted this year that permits each detainee to receive $20,000.
- Agreed in a case from Virginia to decide whether states must continue to provide lawyers for indigent death row inmates after they have lost their initial round of appeals.
- Ruled, 7-2, that police in Pennsylvania did not violate the rights of a man suspected of drunken driving when they failed to read him so-called Miranda warnings when he was stopped for questioning.
- Let stand an Illinois law that bans the possession of child pornography.

Nursing home care found substandard

By Stephanie Morrill
Collegian Reporter

Placing a loved one in a nursing home is a distant, scary thought for most K-State students. However, a study conducted for a statewide consumer organization cited one-third of all nursing homes as providing substandard care.

The study was conducted by Petey Cerf for Kansans for Improvement of Nursing Homes, a consumer organization with statewide membership, interested in achieving higher standards for nursing homes.

Cerf interviewed people who had relatives in nursing homes. She questioned them about the quality of care they believed their relatives were receiving.

"Certain problems appear over and over again in nursing homes, but the two largest concerns include: The nursing aides are not adequately supervised, and there are simply not enough aides to go around," said Harriet Nehring, executive director of Kansas for Improvemnet of Nursing Homes.

"It's only a handful of state nursing homes which are cited as substandard, and it's those ones who ruin the image of the entire group," said Norman Wallace, administrator for Wharton Manor, a Manhattan nursing home.

"I don't perceive the problem of being substandard to the actual care of the patients, but to smaller problems, like a burnt-out light bulb or giving a patient an aspirin and not checking in on him or her two hours later to make sure of its effectiveness," Wallace said.

"The study done by Cerf was conducted by evaluating the attitudes of people with relatives in nursing homes — it wasn't done through evaluation of actual care provided by the homes," he said.

Cerf said: "Although KINH has not sent observers into nursing homes to check on the perceptions, we believe that the reports are obviously valuable as showing the impressions about day-to-day conditions."

"You really must understand Petey in order to understand the study," said Jan Bennett, director of nursing at College Hill Skilled Nursing.

"Petey looks only for the bad in any situation and does not understand that in order to provide extra services for our residents, we need to spend extra money," Bennett said.

"I most definitely went into the study with a biased attitude, looking for the worst," Cerf said. "I was sick and tired of hearing about how substandard the quality of care in these homes was — and I wanted to publicize these deficiencies."

"Good nursing homes are their own good publicity," she said.

Every nursing home is inspected by two different state departments — Social and Rehabilitation Services and the Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

Inspection by SRS includes evaluations by the county health department, the fire department and insurance agents. Inspection by KDHE includes evaluation by the state departments of sanitation and nursing and the fire marshal, Wallace said.

If violations are discovered, the nursing home has six months to correct the problem before reinspection.

"The problem with these evaluations is that one violation could be listed under three or four different headings," Wallace said. When this occurs, the nursing home appears to have more violations than it actually has, he said.

"One reason for this practice is that officials at the state level are afraid the feds will come in and recheck their evaluation," he said.

If the federal government finds a violation that state officials may have missed, it could mean a loss of funds for the nursing home through Medicare and Mediciad, he said.

"The evaluations are made on a scale which determines the amount of money allotted to the cause — it's all tied to money," Wallace said.

Part of the substandard care is attributed to the incompetence and the lack of the nurse's aides.

In order to become eligible to work as a nurse's aide, students must complete a 90-hour course that teaches basic care skills, such as how to bathe and how to feed the elderly, as well as the actual concept of aging, said Myrna Bartel, health occupations inspector at Manhattan Area Vocational Technical School.

The course is divided into lecture and clinical experience.

After completing the course, students are required to pass an exam which can be retaken twice. If students don't pass the second time, they must retake problem areas in the course before taking the exam again, Bartel said.

The need for nursing homes is a rapidly growing concern because society as a whole is getting older, she said. The average age of a person in a nursing home is 84, she said.

"Many times, these people do not have families who are available to take care of them," Bartel said.

"Other times, the family can't meet the medical problems — the person may have a chronic illness or may be experiencing a dimension disorder, such as Alzheimer's disease," Nehring said.

"The core of our organization is advocacy," she said. "We have an active lobbying program and we are involved in both state agency and ad hoc committees.

"During the membership year, we have about 1,000 members; during other times, we have about 800. The purpose of a membership year is to recruit new members for the following years," she said.

Members use newsletters, booklets and brochures to address issues, such as the lack of nursing aides. They also offer advice about placement to those who inquire, Nehring said.

Student Body Presidential Candidates

Bob Copple,
graduate in industrial engineering

Not a very good picture, huh? Expecting a lot of candidate-issue mumbo jumbo? Look elsewhere! I prefer to use this Collegian opportunity to enhance its credibility and expound upon our campaign themes.

We want a kinder, more gentle student body; raze Van Zile or make it an art museum; third time's the charm; water with a vengeance; good grades for good students; for an athletic fee, call Fred; no promises, no disappointments and no past evictions; grape juice and batter-dipped french toast for breakfast for everyone; everyone gets a title; no budget, no tree decorations; condom machines in organized student housing because "students don't always have the chance to make it to the bookstore;" more teachers, fewer administrators; raise morale, not student fees; the buck stops at the student; and we need a student body president who can play a decent flag football game (sorry, Pinkie).

Now for a few questions we'd like answered. Are we trading campus lighting and library books (our thousand points of light) for trash cans, asphalt and grass? Whatever happened to those red foxes? Is a good University judicial system a right or a privilege? Do people really believe complaining will change the parking situation? How about issuing a commemorative coin to finance Lafene? Is the Weber Hall addition's exterior finished? And, in conclusion, what exactly does the student body president do? Sit down and relax, it will take the other candidates some time to answer that one.

Michael K. Cormaci,
senior in agricultural economics

There are many short-term, feasible solutions that can be applied to many daily problems that students face here at K-State.

- Education: Use student-supported lobbying to let the state know that K-State needs more funds not accounted for in the second year of the Margin of Excellence.
- Financial aid: Put into effect as soon as possible the straight-line method of financial aid verification.
- Farrell Library: Provide Students Helping Enhance Library Funding with all available resources to make Farrell a better resource for students and appeal to the state for help in computerizing the library.
- Lafene Student Health Center: Go straight to students and ask for help that is needed for Lafene to provide higher quality health care.
- Parking: Start a car pool information service in conjunction with the K-State Police and continue to work with the City of Manhattan on a mass transportation system.
- Athletics: Look into funding programs that will allow athletic programs at K-State to become competitive at all levels.

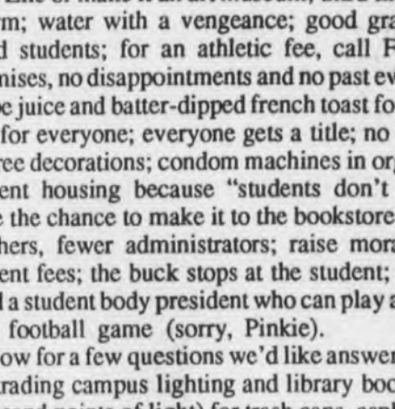
Laurian Cuffy,
senior in management

This election, as all elections, should focus on change. Communities are often afraid of the word change. Many avert change because complacency is more digestible.

In order to bring about change, a process is needed. This process must ensure increased communication and accountability between the student body, our administration and the Student Governing Association. There will have to be structural changes in the SGA in order to include all students in the surfacing and resolving of issues that concern them.

My campaign theme, "Unity and Growth," addresses the need to bring together our diverse but fragmented student body. Our appreciation for diversity is what balances our experiences at K-State. What I learn from a greek student, an international student, a minority student or any other student within our student body can only enrich me. My tenure as student body president will focus on how I can get this diverse student body to unite to resolve its concerns.

Brenda Halinski,
senior in elementary education



First of all, I want to say I am disappointed in the past voter turnout for the elections for student body president and student senators. I am attending Kansas State University, not Kansas State Greek University. However, the greeks are not at fault for occupying all these positions. It is the fault of residence hall members, off-campus students and non-traditional students who fail to vote. The only way we can change this non-diverse arrangement is to vote.

Sally Howard-Clayton and I agree on most issues. We want more involvement from the whole student body, not just one-fourth of our population.

Many candidates keep saying, "I will ask the students."

That's a really nice campaign promise, but shortly after the election, it is somewhat forgotten. We have committees that are supposed to be open to all students. But, as it turns out, those committees usually end up getting only those who are already involved more involved, depriving other students of any chance of involvement.

We need a president who will stay on top of things. Bringing bills before Student Senate at the last possible moment for the senators to pass as if they were puppets is for the birds. Senate should have the option of not approving an appointment if it does not feel that the person chosen for the committee would best serve the students.

Sally Howard-Clayton senior in humanities

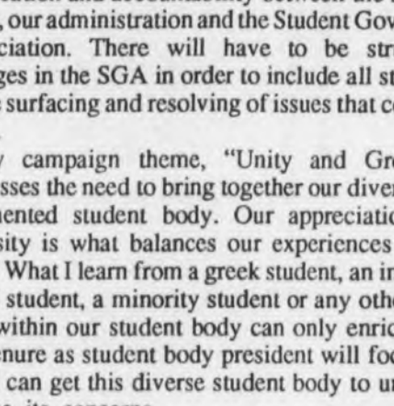
I have been involved in Student Senate for three years as a senator, a finance committee member and a concerned student. Through my involvement in Senate, it became apparent that student government had a basic flaw: It didn't accurately reflect the views of the student population.

The introduction of political parties into our election process would solve this problem. Each party would state its ideology in its platform, so a candidate's affiliation with a party would allow a voter to know what he or she was voting for. The issues Student Senate deals with are University-wide and votes are cast on the basis of ideology. This is why party affiliation, in addition to our current college representation, would be the best way to elect our officials.

Another concern of mine is our investment policy — currently we have none. I feel a greater commitment should be made toward an ethical investment policy. Student monies should not be invested in companies that are insidious to society. Among these would be companies doing business in South Africa.

Students are the vanguard of change, but if they don't understand that their actions have consequences beyond the University, they won't push for responsible change.

Finally, I am also opposed to an athletic fee because the point of higher education is not athletics.



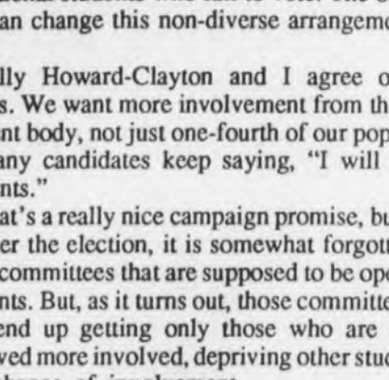
Tom Jones,
sophomore in political science

K-State has a problem: unfair representation of fraternities and sororities in Student Senate. Some would argue that if the greeks can sponsor more viable candidates than the independents can sponsor, then the greeks should be allowed to control Senate.

If similar organizations existed that could sponsor independent candidates, such arguments would be sound. Since no such organizations exist, it is up to student leaders to create a system which provides a more fair representation of the student body.

If elected, I will push for such legislation, creating an atmosphere of less apathy and more student involvement. It is this kind of atmosphere that is necessary for a student body to deal with the challenges it faces.

Scott King,
junior in political science



Awareness and involvement are two areas I think need improvement at K-State. Students, for the most part, are unaware of what is going on around campus and the issues facing a typical K-State student.

This is a big year for students to get involved. There will be many issues here on campus needing their direct attention. Students can play a major role in dictating what happens with the athletic fee, funding for the library, the health fee for Lafene Student Health Center and campus safety problems.

However, campus issues are not the only place students may focus. They can have a big effect at the state level also. The Margin of Excellence plan, selective admissions and the admittance of Washburn University to the regents system are areas where students can play a major role.

I, as a candidate, advocate sending the athletic fee to a referendum, building a grass roots campaign to enhance library funding and making sure Lafene does not have to cut services. These are all issues that mandate student involvement.

The bottom line is this: A student body president cannot be effective unless he or she has input from the students. What I ask is for you to vote for the candidate whom you feel best represents students at K-State and at the same time can effectively communicate student concerns to the people who need to hear them.

Phil Kirk,
senior in agricultural economics

The position of student body president needs an individual who is not only educated on campus issues but who is also sincere in his motives for running for the position. I am prepared to make the commitment of time, effort and resources necessary to represent the student body and communicate its needs to the administration, the regents and the Legislature.

I believe in the proposed athletic fee only when considered jointly with a quality-of-life fee. The fee should encompass K-State arts and athletics. Without a joint proposal, I would not support the fee.

I oppose individual colleges charging additional fees in order to offset their expenses unless it is the consensus of the students of the college to do so. Imposing supplementary fees would set a precedent for solving the continuing demand for revenue by raising student fees.

I believe Lafene Student Health Center is a valuable student service that needs to be maintained. I am, however, opposed to increasing student fees to fund the maintenance. At this time, Lafene has approximately $110,000 in uncollected debts. I advocate withholding a student's diploma and/or prohibiting a student from pre-enrolling until all expenses have been paid.

These issues, along with many others, including Farrell Library, parking and campus safety, find their solution in state funding.

J. D. Llewelyn,
junior in business administration

The decisions made this next year concerning K-State's future will help shape the next 125 years at this University. Money issues will be high on the priority list, and the administration and students will have to work together to get the foundation built. The foundation will be built with communication. It is for this reason that I'm running.

During the past three years, I've been on the Student Tribunal, chancellor of the Tribunal, a lobbyist for Associated Students of Kansas and cochair of Students Helping to Enhance Library Funding. These experiences have shown me one side of K-State government and have only encouraged my interest in serving the student body of K-State.

A student body president must never be satisfied with the status quo. He must be willing to look ahead and toward the future. A president must be realistic, not idealistic, in his thinking and he must be straight-forward when sharing his ideas with the administration.

The issues of Farrell Library, campus security, the proposed athletic and engineering fees and residence hall overcrowding will be top-priority items for the next administration. My administration will be accessible to listen to the concerns of the students on these issues.

As we address these issues, we must never stop K-State's continued growth; however, we must still ensure a quality education, from a qualified faculty, in average facilities.

John McIntyre,
senior in industrial engineering

I'm excited. The increased interest in student government, evident by the record number of candidates this year, is a positive sign for the future of K-State. It will take strong leadership, however, to move this group into the future.

The student body president is the driving force behind this leadership. His or her primary role is representing students' views and concerns, which requires being an effective communicator. The student body president must not only be able to express opinions well to the faculty, administration, Board of Regents and legislators, but he or she must also keep in touch with and listen to the concerns of the students.

My broad involvement at K-State, in addition to my experience in Student Senate and the Associated Students of Kansas, has allowed me to stay in touch with student opinions and learn the ropes of student government on the state as well as the campus level.

A primary concern of mine, which is vital to our future as an outstanding academic institution, is Farrell Library. It is time we quit treating this incredibly underfunded area as a second-rate problem and make it a priority. The students will have to lead the way in making the legislators aware of the seriousness of this problem.

I'm concerned about the future of K-State, and you can show your concern by voting. An important factor in deciding who to vote for not only includes the current issues, but also includes how capable the person will be in responding to issues and situations as they occur during the year.

Phil Nordhus,
senior in economics

We are a very diverse group of students here at K-State. We are of different colleges, different living arrangements, different states, different countries, different genders and different races. The student body president must be able to represent all, effectively communicating the needs of this group to the faculty, administration, Board of Regents and legislators.

I have a broad understanding of students here. I understand students who live off-campus, students in residence halls, students who live in greek houses and students who live in other cooperative housing because I have lived under each of these arrangements. I also understand students who work to pay for their education because I work to help pay for mine.

Combining this understanding with my previous experience in student government and other organizations means I'll be a better representative for students simply because I'm more representative of students.

All actions taken by student government should reflect not only the needs of students as a whole, but also must consider the differences in needs of individual students.

Student fees are necessary for the maintenance of a quality environment. However, fees should be kept as low as possible and should be adapted to the individual, according to the benefits he or she receives from the services that fees provide. I will oppose any fee increases or new fees that do not take these considerations into account.

Candidates for Senate were asked...

Please answer two of the following questions, each in 25 words or less.

1) What would you do to improve the conditions of Farrell Library to bring it up to standards comparable to the quality of education offered at K-State?

2) What are the three most imminent problems affecting K-State that would merit your attention as a senator?

3) What are your thoughts/opinions/concerns regarding divestment of University funds from companies that conduct business in South Africa?

4) What problems hindered the smooth operation of Student Senate this past term, and how would you, as a senator, ensure that this would not be repeated?

5) How would you ensure that the views of your constituents would be adequately represented in Senate?

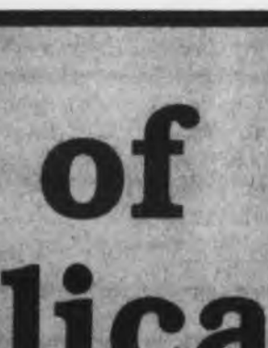
Students to vote in three places

K-State students have three places to cast their votes in this year's student government elections.

"Polling places will be located in the K-State Union, Cardwell Hall, and Derby Food Center," said Eva Chaterjee, elections committee chairwoman. "All three places will be open from 7:30 a.m. to 6:30 p.m."

However, students this year must not only present a picture ID, but their fee cards as well.



Jenny Reschke,

For thousands of people on and off the K-State campus, the Collegian provides a vital link to the activities of this University. And years from now, when many of us are fondly reminiscing about our college years, we will turn to the Royal Purple, our yearbook, to help us re-establish that link.

These award-winning publications must continue to provide this communication link. But to maintain their current levels of excellence and improve them, they constantly need new ideas by new people.

Our Board of Student Publications is the decision-making body responsible for overseeing these publications. As a journalism major with experience as a Collegian reporter, I could offer both organizational experience and new ideas to guide the Collegian and the Royal Purple toward even brighter futures.

Randy Short,
senior in journalism and mass communincations

The quality of student publications at K-State has established a reputation for itself that is recognized throughout many academic and professional circles. Although I believe we have a very strong program, it must also be sensitive and responsive to student interests.

My experience on news staff as campus editor for the Collegian has given me a unique opportunity to understand the organization and politics of not only the newspaper, but the entire department.

Vote today for a strong student voice on the Board of Student Publications — vote for Randy Short.

Brian Smith,
junior in marketing

Why am I running for Board of Student Publications? It seems very simple to me: to maintain and improve the quality and excellence of the Collegian and the Royal Purple.

As a junior in marketing and advertising, I see the importance these publications have to the campus and realize the concern of maintaining the excellence of the Royal Purple and the Collegian.

I feel that with my experience and involvement in photography and advertising, I will be able to open new ideas and expand on the growth in the future.

29 candidates miss deadline

Although there are 130 candidates listed today as running for an office in the student government elections, not all of them will appear on the ballot.

The 29 candidates who failed to turn in expenditure reports to the Student Governing Association office will not be included on the ballot, but may run as write-in candidates.

"The deadline was 5 p.m. on Friday, and these people hadn't handed in their expenditure reports," said Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities and student government adviser. "It really is a shame because I know many of these people still intend to run."

Candidates who failed to turn in their expenditure reports have an asterisk beside their names, which must be written in on the ballot in order to be voted upon.

Gregg A. Hinthorn,
sophomore in journamlism and mass communications

Consistency, accuracy and quality will be my motto as a member of the Student Publications board. Each decision will be scrutinized to see if it meets these criteria.

Currently I write a bi-monthly column for a Kansas City magazine and edit my own newsletter, Imprint.

In the past, I have worked on both the yearbook and newspaper staffs.

Ajit Maan,
graduate student in English

My qualifications include a bachelor's degree in journalism, three years as a political editorial columnist, two Press Women's Association awards and copy layout and editing experience.

As a member of the board, I will ensure accurate and coherent coverage of national, state and campus events and issues. I think Student Senate proceedings are of special importance to all students and deserve more complete coverage.

I will make the editorial page a useful tool for truly stimulating dialogue, in the spirit of the editorial board's statement of purpose, by encouraging more guest columns and letters to the editor. Write in my name at the bottom of the ballot as AJIT MAAN.

College of Arts and Sciences

vote for no more than 14

Anne Banning, sophomore in political science
1) I would work to increase Farrell's operating hours and to reinstate cancelled periodicals. Appeals to alumni and administration recognition of the problem will provide funding.
2) Three imminent problems are the efficiency and condition of financial aid, the upgrading of Farrell Library and a proposed athletic fee.

Kim Jones, sophomore in political science
1) I would increase book volume and reobtain cancelled periodicals. I would increase library hours, making it more accessible. Strengthening alumni relations will accumulate the funds.
2) Three imminent problems facing students are the inefficent distribution of financial aid, the implementation of an athletic fee and the lack of support for Lafene services.

Jenny Bell, junior in political science
2) The regents seem bent on relegating K-State to a second-class status in liberal arts; professors' salaries are too low, making it difficult to retain quality educators. K-State needs to address the farm crisis in more ways than providing counseling.
3) As a member of SEA, which collected hundreds of signatures from people in favor of divestments, I support a policy of ethical investing — including divestment.

Anita Krug, sophomore in pre-law
2) The improvement of Farrell Library, the problems associated with increases in enrollment and student health services funding are issues of great concern to me.
5) To ensure representation of my constituents, I would constantly communicate with students in Arts and Sciences and would be very responsive to all opinions and concerns.

David Blasi, sopohomore in pre-law
1) I would seek funding from the private industry as we do for scholarships. We must set up a fund that will regenerate itself and update the library annually.
5) I would make myself available to my constituents on a personal basis. I would also like to hold information sessions for all students wanting to know what's happening in Senate.

Ron Lackey, freshman in psychology
1) I would lobby for corporate or state funds, and at the same time, stay out of the students' pockets.
2) The student athletic fee, Farrell Library and Lafene Student Health Center — in that order.

Rob Brown, sophomore in political science
2) Campus safety, proposed athletic and engineering fees, and the lack of communication between the Senate and the student body.
5) As a senator, I would commit my time and energy to the concerns of the students by being available and accountable to those I represent.

Kim Linin, junior in psychology
1) To improve Farrell Library, I would petition the state for funds. Then a Senate proposal would be taken to the Board of Regents for approval.
5) To ensure adequate representation of my constituents, I would discuss relevant campus issues with numerous individuals and support the views that best represent the majority.

Wendi Coffman, junior in journalism and mass communications
2) Farrell Library, Lafene Student Health Center, and the athletic fee.
5) By reaching out to constituents and questioning their views, I could sense true feelings, and in return, express these views in Senate.

Brian Lunceford, junior in journalism and mass communications
1) I believe the state needs to allocate additional funds to improve the conditions of Farrell Library. This issue deserves immediate attention.
2) The Farrell Library, campus safety (lighting) and the proposed athletic fee.

Kurt Elmore, freshman in computer science
1) I feel that as a senator the three most imminent problems affecting K-State that merit my attention are: the ever increasing tuition, the outrageous parking problem and our out-of-date library.
5) I will actively participate in both the general and committee meetings and always have an open mind as to what my constituents want.

Patrick J. Murphy, junior in political science
1) I would support increases in money allocated by the student government and lobby for support from the Legislature.
2) I believe Senate must face the deficient standards of Farrell, the finances of Lafene and the continued promotion of K-State as a top university.

Shaun Evans, freshman in political science

Samuel S. Ory, sophomore in political science
1) Studies have been done to find out what Farrell needs. It is time for a comprehensive plan that brings Farrell back up to standards.
5) Listen to as many students as possible. You can't just talk to those in your house or residence hall. All views need to be heard.

Steve Franzen, sophomore in journalism and mass communications
1) To become a competitive scholarly library, Farrell Library must computerize all its data and make that data accessible and functional.
2) Three major problems facing K-State are an inflated student fee program, a crime-riddled campus and an apathetic attitude toward education and K-State.

Heidi Reiling, sophomore in biology
2) The Athletic Department, Lafene and Farrell Library all need financial help. As students, we may not have a choice as to rising tuition costs, but we should certainly have a voice in where our money is spent.
5) I would research upcoming bills and be well informed of the costs and benefits to the college and the student body (communication being essential). I would listen to anyone's concerns or discuss the issues at any time.

Eric Freberg, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine
1) We need to apply pressure to the administration and to the state for more funds to improve Farrell Library.
2) I believe that Farrell, Lafene and fees like the athletic and health fees require the most attention from Student Senate.

Les Roggenkamp, freshman in journalism and mass communications
2) I believe the three things constantly hindering students are increasing fees, inadequacy of Farrell Library and insufficient parking.
5) I would listen to any suggestions fellow students present, and I would also investigate and prepare a report for the Senate on that problem.

Johnny Gaffney, sophomore in pre-law
2) The three most imminent problems are the condition of Farrell Library, the debt of Lafene Health Center and the distribution of the Educational Opportunity Fund.
5) I would ensure representation by encouraging constituents to speak with me personally or by leaving suggestions and opinions in Eisenhower 113, and I would speak with special-interest clubs.

Mark Schreiner, sophomore in English
4) Debate concerning only the Senate, such as the recent impeachment scandal, should be conducted on the Senate's own time, not during normal meetings.
3) K-State should divest from South Africa because economic pressure hurts apartheid, and the University rarely has a chance to do this much good.

Kristen Good, sophomore in general chemistry
2) Three of the most pressing issues currently affecting students are the situation with Lafene and the propositions of athletic and engineering fees.
5) My attendance at meetings will give me the opportunity to voice the concerns of my constituents who come to my attention through my involvement with the University.

David Shepard, freshman in pre-law
2) Three crucial issues at K-State are the conservation of student dollars, problems with student housing, and how we will handle increasing student enrollment.
5) Personal contact with every student in our college is unrealistic, however, opinions, beliefs and concerns brought to my attention will be represented with enthusiasm.

Jenny Heiniger, freshman in political science
2) The three most imminent problems affecting K-State are the condition of Farrell Library, Lafene and distribution of state funds.
5) A column in the Collegian is a definite must. Through this communication, a majority of K-State students could be kept better informed on Senate activities.

Travis Stumpff, junior in political science
2) I will address the threat of rapidly increasing tuition and fees, the frustrating parking problem and the overall situation of not enough state funds being spent on K-State.
5) I will keep in contact with the college council, student clubs, living groups, residence hall boards and academic departments, and I will maintain more office hours than required.

Doug Holle, sophomore in pre-optometry
2) The most important issues I would work to solve are the student athletic fee, Farrell Library improvement and the $10 engineering fee.
5) To help student views be known, I would encourage students to attend meetings, become involved in committees and make senators work for the students' interests.

Stacy Sweazy, junior in journalism and mass communications
2) My main concerns as a student senator would be: to increase campus parking, to support state funding for Farrell Library and to ensure equitable pay to retain quality educators.
5) I am a verbal person. By consistent communication with the administration, arts and sciences council members and students, an active voice would be heard.

Darin Hopkins, sophomore in pre-optometry
2) I would focus my attention on campus safety (lighting and emergency phones), campus parking and increased relations and support from the Board of Regents.
4) Problems I observed were poor time management and misinterpreted legislation. My solution would be to set an example and know the constitution and bylaws.

Anja Teasley, junior in speech
1) The administration must know that we, the students, are concerned about the library. We need the administration to make improving the library a top priority.
2) The condition of Farrell Library, campus safety (including attitudes and need for education) and Lafene's financial situation.

Mitchel Jamison, sophomore in pre-optometry

Rich van Resburg, freshman in pre-law

Brent Jones, freshman in pre-med
2) My attentions as a senator would focus mainly on the problems of improving Farrell Library, the parking situation and the use of the athletic fee.
5) My personal views would not interfere with my decisions if I saw enough opposition among my constituents. I would find people's views and represent them.

Kent Welch, sophomore in radio-television
1) I believe immediate funding can be found either through the state, local support groups or alumni.
2) Farrell Library's improvement, a close look at student funds (i.e. the tuition increase) and the athletic fee.

College of Engineering

vote for no more than 8

Pat Boos, freshman in construction science

Brian Linin, freshman in engineering
4) Argumentation of minute, cumbersome details inhibited Senate operation this past term. Although details are important in some cases, I would end unimportant or redundant arguments.
5) My constituents would obviously be completely represented by me, as I would request their opinions and ideas concerning all matters.

Rob Brooks, senior in chemical engineering

Steven Matthews, freshman in electrical engineering

John Curtis, freshman in engineering

David McIntyre, junior in electrical engineering
1) Students must be aware of the major cutbacks Farrell Library has been making and make the library No. 1 on their priority list.
2) Three main problems afflicting K-State are: an underfunded and noncompetitive Farrell Library, the $10 per credit hour increase for engineering classes and concern for Lafene Student Health Center shutting night services.

Brian Darby, sophomore in chemical engineering
2) I would have to go after the problems that affect the most students. Those three problems would be Farrell Library, public safety and parking.
4) The obvious problem was the inconsistent attendance at Senate meetings. I believe stricter enforcement of penalties against absences would remedy the situation.

Michaelane Muhlenbruch, sophomore in industrial engineering
2) Finding solutions for the $10 engineering fee, the parking problem and the athletic fee would be among my top concerns.
3) I believe it is important for students to better understand the pros and cons of cutting off financial support to South African companies.

Carrie Davies, junior in mechanical engineering
2)Faculty salaries are too low to be competitive with peer insitutions, improper allocation of scholarship funds between freshmen and upperclassmen and the proposed tuition hike with engineering fee.
5) As senator, I would be receptive to the views and concerns of each individual. I would also ensure that students know their opinions are important.

Timothy Alan Oswalt, freshman in engineering
1) I feel Farrell Library needs to be open longer. In order to maintain and increase the services available, funding by the University is needed.
2) In my opinion the three most pressing issues are funding of student health services, campus safety and the College of Engineering equipment and laboratory fee.

Phil Dodderidge, freshman in electrical engineering
2) The major problems are Farrell, Lafene and the computing facilities. These need to be improved. Also, improvements in lab facilities are as important as any other campus improvements.
5) As membership chairman of IEEE, I know the problems of the department. I will stay informed and actively work to solve these problems.

Rob Patterson, sophomore in industrial engineereing
1) Farrell needs help. The funds needed to fix Farrell are beyond Senate, but Senate can help Farrell by putting pressure on people with the funds.
2) Problems are enrollment, Margin of Excellence and football. Enrollment has caused overcrowding. Our instructors aren't paid enough. The KSU Athletic Department wants a fee to cover football's losses.

Andy Evans, sophomore in architectural engineering

Brian Pitman, freshman in mechanical engineering
1) For two years running, the Senate has said, "Farrell will be supported 'by the Senate'" — this has not happened. It's time to change attitudes and support academics.
4) To avoid future Senate problems, I will be responsible, dedicated, committed and a strong communicator for engineering students.

Kurt Forge, sophomore in industrial engineering
2) K-State's most pressing dilemma is the lack of funds for Farrell, Lafene, engineering lab maintenance and athletics, countered by students' need for an inexpensive education.
4) Organization and some senators' counterproductive pursuits (impeachment) hindered Senate's operation. This can be cured by leadership, by formatting meetings tightly and by electing concerned individuals.

Pat Roemer, sophomore in architectural engineering

Paul Gerber, freshman in construction science
1) In order to improve the status of Farrell Library, I believe it is necessary to allocate more funds from the state.
2) Three of the problems which would merit my attention as a senator are: the engineering fee, renovation of Farrell Library and the athletic fee.

Loren Sheets, freshman in engineering
1)Increase resource availability by increasing current funding, to increase student accessibility by expanding current operation hours and to maintain Farrell's available services.
2) Three problems currently in need of campus-wide attention are the economic condition of Farrell Library, the economic stability of Lafene Health Center and the ever-continuing problems of campus safety.

Todd Giefer, sophomore in architectural engineering
2) The proposed engineering fee is terrible. It's indicative of the state's failure to commit to essential capital improvements. Other problems include inadequate parking and lighting.
5) Senate habitually approves requests for fee increases. Students don't like that. I will work to minimize any proposed fee increase and preserve the students' interests.

Doug Stuhlsatz, junior in construction science

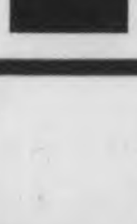
Matt Higgins, senior in electrical engineering
1) My top priority is to legislate the necessary funds to upgrade Farrell.
5) Be assured that I will know the intricacies of all the issues before the Senate, and I will do my best to make decisions based on the ideas of all engineering students.

Kathy Tryon, sophomore in engineering
1) I would help increase awareness to the administration that the condition of Farrell Library is one of the students' top priorities.
5) I will talk to the students, research their concerns, and express those concerns in Senate.

Susan Howard, sophomore in chemical engineering
2) The three most imminent problems which would merit my attention as a senator would be the library (conditions and resources), the athletic fee and campus safety.
4) Contradictions between bylaws, legislation and policy hindered the smooth operation of Senate. I would be aware of the bylaws and make sure contradictions were worked out early.



Craig Uhrich, sophomore in nuclear engineering
1) University officials have said that Farrell is a "priority." Unfortunately, that won't produce any money until students show it's their priority and support it.
4) During my term on the Finance Committee, senators had a habit of funding things they wanted, without looking at their constituents' desires. That habit must be broken.

Andrew Kasten, senior in agricultural economics

Jerry Visser, freshman in industrial engineering

Scott Kelly, graduate student in speech
2) I am for an increase in funding for Farrell Library and Lafene Student Health Center. I am against any increase in the athletic fee.
3) Why is our University putting money into a country which has a government that is an oppressive, anti-black, terrorist state? It must stop.

Michael Steinle, graduate in business administration

College of Business Administration

vote for no more than 9

Sean Barrett, freshman in business
2) The athletic fund, the lighting problem for student safety and the funding of Lafene.
3) Seeing the current condition, I feel further research must take place before divestment of University funds is considered.

Kristin Johnson, sophomore in business
1) I will actively support students' lobbying efforts to convince the Legislature and the Board of Regents that the students of K-State want funding for Farrell Library to be a top priority.
5) I will be available to listen to the ideas of my constituents and support those views by my regular attendance to Senate meetings.

Barry Beck, junior in business administration
2) Forced divestment is a restriction of trade. I am for free and unrestricted international trade.
3) The three most imminent problems are Farrell Library, Lafene Student Health Center and maintaining the Margin of Excellence program.

Lindsey Knox, junior in marketing
2) The issues concerning Lafene Student Health, Farrell Library improvements and increased campus protection will be my main priorities as business senator.
5) Through interactions with students in business classes and organizations, I will be able to research and relate any opinions or concerns expressed by my constituents to Senate.

Scott Bieker, sophomore in business
2) I feel the most pressing problems affecting K-State are the depressed sport programs, crime on campus and inadequate parking.
5) I will listen to the views of others to help form my own opinion and stand behind my judgment.

Eric Long, sophomore in pre-professional business administration
1) Lobby the state harder. Farrell obviously needs more money, but why should the students pay for it? The tuition we pay now is high enough!
4) I think they spent too much time trying to impeach one another. I would spend my time impeaching K-State's problems — not my fellow senators.

Chace Brundige, sophomore in business
1) The library needs money. We need to put more pressure on the adminstration and possibly the state.
2) The library, Lafene and student fees, like the health and athletic fees, concern the students the most.

Doug Loyd, freshman in business administration

William C. Burke, freshman in business
2) As a senator my three major concerns must be the incredibly inconvenient parking situation, renovating Farrell Library and the upcoming athletic fee.
5) To ensure my fellow business majors are properly represented, I will faithfully attend all regular and committee meetings, always voicing your opinion over my own.

Terry Milford, junior in marketing
1) I would stress that student assistants in Farrell do a good job, since they make up over 40 percent of the staff in the library.
2) I support finding an alternative process of waiting in line to pay fees, such as other Big Eight schools' use of a billing method. Two other problems facing Student Senate are the allocation of student fees and parking.

Terry Carlgren, freshman in pre-professional business administration
2) The Educational Opportunity Fund, Farrell Library and the student athletic fee would be at the top of my Senate agenda.
4) Senate has a problem with its attendance policy. I propose that after the first three absences, the senator's grade will be automatically dropped one letter for every two absences.

Kip Pammenter, junior in pre-professional business adminstration
1) Make sure our current funds are properly allocated and find ways of attaining new money to upgrade the areas most in need.
2) The upgrading of Farrell Library, support for the Margin of Excellence program and increasing enrollment with a minimal increase in resources.

Kevin Carroll, freshman in business administration

Jill Rathbun, junior in management
2) An increase in the student-to-teacher ratio, the cutting of the number of sections offered per class and the problem of recruiting quality faculty members.
5) I will represent the ideas and concerns of the business administration student, not my own concerns. I will accomplish this by being active in organizations within the college, so I will be available to listen to the concerns of my fellow students.

Chris Dunitz, senior in pre-professional business administration
1) The answer: the Board of Regents. Under the same state funding, our library should be just as impressive as our rival, the University of Kansas.
2) The most imminent problems are the upgrading of Farrell Library, the ongoing problem with the parking situation and the much-needed passage of an athletic fee.

Tim Rodriguez, sophomore in business administration

Chris Forrer, senior in business finance
1) I will suggest that Farrell be given the same funding priority the other facilities on campus have received for making improvements.
4) An accurate interpretation of Senate bylaws and personal differences among members slowed efficiency in the Senate. I will encourage that these problems be solved outside Senate meetings.

Brian Rodrock, sophomore in business administration
1) The seating capacity will be improved, but I think the lack of quality materials for us to work with hinders our education.
2) Losing key educators due to lower than normal salaries, the decreasing services of Lafene and the potential for a sudden increase of tuition or fees.

Ben Frisch, freshman in business administration
1) To raise the standards of Farrell Library so it is comparable to the other Big Eight institutions, we must appropriate more funds from the state.
2) The athletic fee, the renovation of Farrell Library, and the engineering fee.

Mark Schmidt, sophomore in business
1) The way to improve Farrell is to get more funding from the state and alumni donations. An extra student fee should not even be considered.
2) The most pressing problems facing Senate at this time are the proposed athletic fee, safety on campus and funding for Lafene Student Health Center.

Dax Hayden, freshman in business administration

Shane Walker, senior in business administration
1) I'll fully support the Students Helping Enhanced Library Funding program, which I believe has the potential to awaken the administration and the regents to our desperate need of funding.
5) If elected, I will talk to groups, as well as individual constituents, to gain their viewpoints. Then I would discuss these with other senators and represent my constituents.

Heather Johnson, junior in accounting
1) Farrell Library needs to greatly increase the amount of current books and periodicals available and to extend its hours.
5) As a senator, I would like to place a suggestion box in Calvin Hall to allow business students to voice their opinions and concerns.

Jim Weast, junior in business administration

College of Education

vote for no more than 4

Jenny Barenberg, sophomore in secondary education
2) I believe funding for Farrell Library, stabilizing Lafene's financial situation and the parking dilemma are the issues Student Senate can alleviate most effectively.
5) I would include an update of the Senate issues in the COE newsletter encouraging students to voice their suggestions and concerns to their senators.

Herb Halinski, senior in education
1) The administration needs to put the library higher on its priority list. Saying it is a priority is one thing, but doing something about it is another.
4) People last term overstepped their authority. I will adhere to constitutional guidelines and do what I can to see that Senate stays within its boundaries.

Monica Connet, sophomore in pre-professional elementary education
2) As an education senator, I would be concerned with childcare at K-State, increased funding by legislators for Farrell Library and funding for the Margin of Excellence plan.
5) I will continue communicating with students by researching issues and answering concerns of education students and I would vote accordingly with the views of my constituents.

Stephanie Haub, senior in secondary education
1) I would work to make this issue a priority to students, thereby showing the administration and the Kansas Legislature it's an issue needing immediate attention.
2) Inadequate library funding, the possibility of discontinued MOE funding and the increasing tendency to indiscriminately assess student fees.

Mark Hager, sophomore in pre-professional secondary education
2) Problems Student Senate must address this semester include appropriating funds for the improvement of Farrell Library, keeping athletic fund increases away from student tuitions and funding only groups which represent an interest in Kansas State University.
5) In order to be receptive to the views of the College of Education, I plan to make myself visible to the students and listen to any concerns they have.

Kirk Schuler, sophomore in pre-professional elementary education

Charles Adams, freshman in agricultural economics
1) I feel Senate should take a deliberate action to expose more publicly the inadequacies of the library in order to generate interest among the students and faculty in this important issue.
5) My family has been involved in agriculture in Kansas for more than 100 years. I feel that I can well represent the College of Agriculture because of the importance I place on this field of study.

Terry Ohlde, junior in animal sciences and industry

Todd Heitschmidt, junior in agriculture economics
4) As a senator, I would limit the time wasted on unnecessary discussion of Senate problems and act on the issues that face the student body.
5) I would represent my constituents by listening and discussing issues they feel are a concern to the College of Agriculture and to the University.

Greg Skaggs, sophomore in milling science and management
1) I want a committee organized to pressure the administration to increase funding to bring back the magazines and volumes that have been cut.
3) I am opposed to ethical investment. However, I would like to see what the Investment Ad Hoc committee finds as the best solution.

Todd Johnson, junior in agronomy
1) I'm cochairman of Students Helping Enhance Library Funding. This group will lobby the University, ASK, the Board of Regents and the state to increase awareness of Farrell.
2) The Margin of Excellence, selective admissions and Farrell Library are big statewide issues for K-State this year, and Student Senate needs to consider numerous campus issues.

Michael Stenstrom, freshman in animal sciences and industry
2) I feel there are many problems facing K-State today. Of these I feel that Farrell Library, fees and parking are the most pressing.
5) I would make sure all buildings have my address and phone listed for easy access. Also I would try to arrange weekly office hours.

Anne Krauss, junior in agriculture education
1) I would work to increase awareness of Farrell Library's role as the core educational resource on campus and push for administrational budgeting priority.
2) I am concerned about increasing unavailability of educational facilities like Farrell Library and departmental space, residential accommodation of the growing student body and campus security.

Kyle Vanover, junior in agriculture economics
1) Senate should make Farrell Library a priority, researching all possible funding. I believe student fee increases must be a last resort.
5) I would try to be accessible to students and vote in their best interests. I think representation is a key responsibility of senators.

Brent R. Lehner, junior in animal sciences and industry
2) The three most imminent problems affecting K-State are proposed fee increases, campus safety and funding for Lafene Student Health Center.
5) I would make sure my constituents know who their senators are and stress the importance of communication on critical issues.

John Woodbury, sophomore in animal sciences and industry
2) Three major problems meriting attention are the condition of Farrell Library, funding for Lafene and the football team's losing record.
5) Every agriculture student's view would not only be welcomed, but encouraged, so as to ensure each person is adequately represented.

College of Architecture and Design

vote for no more than 3

David Bellomo, sophomore in environmental design
1) In order to improve standards, appropriate funds must be taken from our tuition in order to renovate Farrell Library.
2) The three most imminent campus problems are: the lack of funds for Farrell Library, the athletic and engineering fees and the lack of campus parking.

Chris Kern, senior in landscape architecture
4) Being a senator last semester, the problems arose from previous senate bills that conflicted with our constitution. Senate operations are presently clearing up these concerns.
5) I voted in favor of the present ad hoc committee looking into the possible divestment of University funds. We need to wait for the report before making any decisions.

Jeff Chapman, freshman in environmental design
2) The three most imminent problems at K-State are solving inadequate parking, reorganizing Farrell Library and improving campus lighting.
4) This year, 34 senators were up for impeachment. I will not only fulfill outlined duties and follow policy, but also help make new policy and make sure policies are being carried out.

Mary Lane, senior in architecture
1) Farrell Library exemplifies the effects of minimal state funding. Lobbying at the state capital is something I can personally do for higher education in Kansas.
2) My three concerns are the condition of Farrell Library, better lighting on campus and a better funded sports club organization because these issues directly affect student life.

Scott DeBlaze, junior in environmental design
2) The three most imminent problems affecting K-State at this time are rape, the declining conditions of Farrell Library and the question of a raise in the athletic fee.
5) In the past, Student Senate has been hindered by boring, drawn-out meetings. I would do my best to ensure the promotion of a short, concise Senate meeting.

Jeff Passantino, junior in environmental design
1) I will form a committee to compare our library with that of the University of Kansas (the No. 1 library in the Big Eight) and then address the state with the facts.
5) To assure my constituents would be represented in Student Senate, I would make myself available at specific times during the week in Seaton Hall.

Jim Jesik, sophomore in environmental design
2) Racism and sexism may not be striking, but they exist. Tuition increases must be more closely monitored. Student government does not represent all students.
3) Businesses operating in South Africa financially sustain that government's flagrantly oppressive policies. Regardless of lost investment income, we must divest all funds from these businesses.

Christine Scharrer, sophomore in environmental design
3) By investing funds in companies conducting business in South Africa, we are supporting racism. We should make our disapproval clear through divestment.
5) In order to ensure the views of my constituents are adequately represented as a senator, I would present issues to them from time to time and keep lines of communication open through such things as one-on-one discussions.

Robb Karlin, junior in environmental design
1) Encourage the administration to reassess its attitudes toward the University's main objective — education and student services, fulfilling needs before wants. Priorities include Lafene and Farrell Library.
2) Although Farrell Library is the smallest in the Big Eight, its size should not be the only issue. The administration should emphasize quality and not just sheer number of volumes.

Tracy Gough, junior in exercise science
2) A senator should be answerable to the students. Therefore, my attention would be focused upon finding solutions to those problems of greatest concern to students.
5) If elected, I will effectively communicate the views of my constituents to the Senate by actively seeking those students' opinions who I would represent.

Elisha Perry, freshman in pre-occupational therapy
1) As a student senator, I would ensure the improvement of Farrell Library by obtaining greater funds to buy more updated materials.
2) The three issues concerning K-State that I believe to be of greatest importance are: Farrell Library, the health fee and the athletic fee.

Jodi McGatlin, junior in family life and human development
1) Additional funding is needed to upgrade the publications and to extend the hours in order to better meet the needs of students.
5) I will be readily available to discuss the thoughts and ideas important to my constituents, and I will report those concerns back to Senate.

Tory Poma, sophomore in hotel and restaurant management
2) The overall improvement of Farrell Library, the debate over athletic fees and the strengthening of Lafene medical services.
5) I would leave myself available to discuss their views and represent these views in a strong, positive way.

Jeff Ralston, sophomore in hotel and restaurant management

Lee Slaten, junior in dietetics
1) I would like to represent the views of Human Ecology students. In doing so, Farrell Library is a concern to all. I will work toward more library hours and allocating funds for more materials and facilities.
2) Among problems meriting attention are campus safety, the athletic fee and Lafene Student health services.

Cari Richert, freshman in apparel and textile marketing
1) I hope to increase the understanding that the importance of funding and renovation is directly related to the enthusiasm we display as concerned students.
2) Issues such as the extensive renovation of Farrell Library, whether the athletic fee should be raised, and the distribution of adequate funding for Lafene are most imminent.

K-Staters may travel to USSR during break

By Diane Zumwalt
Collegian Reporter

K-State students can experience glasnost for themselves with a trip to the Soviet Union during Christmas Break. For the first time, K-State has been invited to participate in a field tour of the Soviet Union sponsored by Emporia State University.

The group will be led by professor Roger Findley, ESU professor of foreign languages, who has been tour coordinator since the first trip in 1969.

"The tour is a special opportunity for students from Kansas universities to visit Russia, a country about which Americans have many misconceptions," Findley said. "We are pleased to be able to open the trip to K-State students for the first time."

Usually, about 20 students make the tour, Findley said. Because of widening interest about the Soviet Union among college students, the trip has been opened to K-State and University of Kansas students, as well as those from ESU, he said.

Donna Stuber, doctoral candidate in student counseling and personnel, is the contact person for the tour at K-State.

"I went on the trip two years ago, and it was one of the most rewarding experiences of my life," she said. "Being in the USSR gave me a unique opportunity to do research for my thesis and make some new friends."

Stuber said the Russian people are extremely curious about Americans and the Russian attitude toward foreigners is friendly.

"This is a very good time for Americans to visit the Soviet Union because glasnost has given the Russians a better attitude toward the West," Stuber said.

The tour will leave from Kansas City International Airport on Dec. 26 and return on Jan. 10.

The first scheduled stop will be in Moscow. After that, the group will spend several days in Riga.

Reagan signs copyright legislation

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — President Reagan signed legislation Monday clearing the way for U.S. entry into a century-old international copyright agreement, calling it "a victory in the name of a right as old as the union itself."

The signing ceremony in a hotel ballroom was attended by a number of movie stars and executives, including entertainers Pat Boone, Cyd Charisse and Cesar Romero.

White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said they were "interested in the bill as it relates to the movie industry."

Reagan said that in 1986 alone the entertainment industry may have lost as much as $2 billion and the computer software industry as much as $4 billion in potential revenue because its copyright laws differed from those of other countries.

The worldwide treaty provides reciprocal copyright protection for American artists and writers and those of 76 other countries. The legislation brings American copyright law into compliance with the 102-year-old Bern Convention for the Protection of Literary and Artistic Works.

The Senate ratified the treaty on Oct. 20, but legislation making changes in American copyright laws was also needed before the United States could become a full-fledged member of the convention.

Differences between American and other nations' copyright laws stalled ratification for decades, but many of the obstacles were removed when Congress enacted a sweeping overhaul of U.S. copyright law in 1976.

Participation in the convention will enable the United States to have copyright relations with 24 countries with which it now has none, officials said.

The convention was signed in Bern on Sept. 9, 1886. It spells out minimum copyright standards, detailing what is protected and how long the copyright lasts. It also bars member nations from discriminating against protected works from other member states.

Perry starts fast in jet ski competition

Staff/Jeff Stead

Professional jet skier Bret Perry, senior in wildlife biology, cuts a corner on one foot while practicing his freestyle routine Monday afternoon at Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

By Tom Morris
Sports Editor

Bret Perry doesn't sport a tan. He isn't into phrases such as tubular, bitchin' or radical. Instead of jams and tennis shoes, he wears jeans and cowboy boots.

But Perry, senior in wildlife biology, is doing quite well in a sport dominated by inhabitants of the Florida sunshine and the California coastline. He is ranked as the No. 1 jet skier in Kansas and placed eighth in the pro freestyle competition last week at the World Finals in Lake Havasu, Ariz.

What is even more remarkable about Perry's accomplishment — besides the fact that his practice time is limited to about four months annually in this region — is that he just started competing last year.

His instant success, though, hasn't been easy.

"There were times when I really felt out of place," Perry said. "Most of the other guys have been competing together for four or five years. Then I show up and didn't know a soul. It was tough starting out.

"I also thought I was ripped off a few times because I was doing tricks no one had seen before and the judges didn't score me very high because I was new," he added. "It's just like any other sport. You have to make a name for yourself."

The entire idea of racing jet skis is suffering an identity crisis as well.

"They've been racing on the (West) Coast since about 1972, and the sport could become as big as motocross is. But if I can't find some sponsors, and if the sport doesn't pick up some more sponsorship, it could be over just about as quick as it started."

Although Perry made about $1,500 this year in competition, he has about broke even because of costs of travel, maintenance and gas.

Perry, 22, could be thought of as an "old-timer."

"Most of the guys are younger than me — in the 14- to 18-year-old age group. The world champion for the last two years just turned 17. You have to be young and have a lot of endurance for this sport. It beats the hell out of you," he said.

Perry rides a modified jet ski that can reach 55 mph. A conventional jet ski's top velocity is about 40 mph.

"It doesn't feel real good to wipe out when you're going 40 miles an hour," Perry said.

"I was going full-throttle in a race this year, wiped out, and it felt like my whole body was swollen. I'd say I have to make about two trips to the chiropractor a year."

His trip to Arizona was quite an experience for the El Dorado native. The competition was on the Colorado River in Lake Havasu, the site of the London Bridge.

"There were more than 3,000 people watching. There were competitors there from all over the U.S., Japan and Australia. It was quite a change from competing in tournaments in the Midwest," he said.

Jet ski competition is run much the same as ice skating competitions. Riders first compete in a slalom race, which is similar to the compulsories in skating. Once the boring technicalities are out of the way, it is time to "show their stuff" in freestyle competition.

"I can barefoot ski, ride it backwards, submarine (make the ski go entirely underwater) and create a waterfall, which the crowd always loves. Some people jump their skis, and I saw one guy juggle while riding," Perry said.

Though the riders can seemingly make their skis do the impossible, Perry said riders must keep one thought in the back of their minds.

"Jet skis are machines, and you can't always make them do what you want them to do," he said.

Perry is the No. 1-ranked jet skier in Kansas and placed eighth in the pro freestyle competition last week at the World Finals in Arizona.

Steinbrenner hires Green as new Yankees' manager

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — There are two Georges at Yankee Stadium now, and the new one sounds very much like the old one.

George Dallas Green Jr., 17th manager in the reign of George M. Steinbrenner III, was introduced to New York on Monday. Green has the reputation of a tough guy and sounded like it.

"I really believe in some disciplines that are really necessary to bring a team together," said Green, who replaced Lou Piniella Oct. 7. "I had a slogan in Philadelphia, 'We, not I,' and I think that's the way it should be done."

But for the past 16 years in Yankees Stadium, the slogan has been the same as the initials following the Yankee owners' name: "I, I, I." Steinbrenner has gone through 11 general managers, 17 managers, 30 pitching coaches and nine spokesmen.

"I think the understanding George and I have is that we're men and we're going to talk together as men," Green said. "We recognize there's going to be difficult times along the line."

A difficult time in Yankee Stadium is any period in which the home team is not comfortably in first place. Dick Howser was fired in 1980 after the Yankees won 103 games and lost in the playoffs.

Howser was fired partly because he objected to Steinbrenner's attempt to dismiss third-base coach Mike Ferraro. Howser thought the manager should determine his staff. Steinbrenner obviously thought differently.

"I'm confident I can handle those kinds of confrontations," Green said.

The two men have much in common, from their desire to be in first place to their tempers.

"I don't think George Steinbrenner's worse than anybody else in baseball and he's better than most of them," Green said. "I want to win today. I want to win tomorrow. I want to win next week and certainly in 1989."

He doesn't believe he's always as tough as his reputation suggests.

"I can be as hard as I have to be," Green said. "I'm not the ogre some people make me out to be. I like to think I'm as compassionate as the next guy."

Previous Yankees managers have frequently found out about trades and player promotions and demotions from reporters.

"He's the owner," Green said. "What the heck, it's his ballgame to a degree."

Green said he's sent letters to all Yankees players and has talked with a few. Tommy John, the 45-year-old left-hander, doesn't have much a future if Green gets to decide.

"If I'm building a pitching staff, I want to start with some younger guys," Green said.

He doesn't particularly want to trade Don Mattingly, but he's willing to listen. He said he told that to Mattingly last week.

At the start of Monday's discussion, Harvey Greene, the current Yankees spokesman, told reporters to "Fire away."

"Is that a way to start?" Green asked with a laugh. "I haven't gotten fired yet."

Big 8 coaches strongly oppose adding 12th game to schedule

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — If adding a 12th football game were up to Big Eight coaches, the vote would be a resounding 7-1 against.

"I'm dead against it," said Kansas Coach Glen Mason Monday during the Big Eight's weekly teleconference.

"I think it's ridiculous," said K-State's Stan Parrish. "We never think about the players, always the money, always this, always that. Eleven games? Three weeks of pre-season practicing, on astroturf, with the academic demands and pressure on kids? In my mind, a lot of times there is too much pressure right now. Adding a game, to me, is in the best interests of everybody but the most important people, the players."

"It's a bunch of junk," said Iowa State's Jim Walden while reminding everyone he has fewer scholarship players than programs like Nebraska and Oklahoma which have been well managed for several years. "With 69 scholarship guys, that's all I need is another game. I hope we can get Miami or Florida State. I don't want to pick somebody in that twelfth game who would be a pushover. Why don't we just give the kids the first semester off and play 15 games?"

"As a coach, I would have some reservations," said Nebraska's Tom Osborne. "The season is plenty long enough right now. I would hope that if something is done, some compensation could be given to the players, whether it's some kind of stipend or provision where a student's trip home at Christmas is paid for. We're progressingly asking more and more of the players and giving them less and less in return. Twenty-five years ago, a season was nine games. Then it went to 10. Then it went to 11. Now 12? And scholarships are being progressively reduced."

Only Colorado's Bill McCartney was solidly in favor.

"I'm for it," he said. "I'm for it if we can attract an opponent where we can have a capacity crowd. I don't see any reason not to."

K-State is busily looking for a replacement for Parrish, who has announced his resignation at the end of the year. The Wildcats are winless for the year and without a victory since beating Kansas two years ago this month. K-State suffers from the same legacy of bad management by previous staffs that Walden faced when he came to Iowa State two years ago. And under the circumstances, the Cyclone coach is not optimistic for the Wildcats in their search.

"I can't imagine anybody going down there unless they're out of work," he said. "Because of the numbers situation. It has nothing to do with the pride of Kansas State or the facilities. You can't put a great coliseum at right guard. If the president and athletic director at Kansas State can't show the coach coming in that he can, within two years, have the same ample number of athletes that everybody else has, then it's ludicrous. I can't see anybody in Division I football leaving their jobs under normal circumstances to go to Kansas State right now. Why would anybody do what I did? I'm the only idiot in this world."

A lot of people will be laughing at the prospect of Kansas and Kansas State playing this week with their collective 0-16 record. But in fact, the game will showcase two of the best receivers in the Big Eight, if not the nation. Kansas State's Greg Washington leads the conference with seven touchdown catches and 728 yards in receptions while Willie Vaughn, Kansas' slick senior, has caught 29 passes for 712 yards and six touchdowns.

And neither man is playing for an offensive juggernaut.

"I certainly hope that because we're not playing well, what he's doing will not be overlooked by anybody," Parrish said of Washington. "He and Hart Lee Dykes (of Oklahoma State) put on one of the greatest shows I've ever seen Saturday. Willie Vaughn's a super receiver, too. He might be the fastest guy in the league. It brings some prominence to our league."

Lady Cats plan scrimmages

Preseason scrimmages have been announced for the K-State women's basketball team. The Lady Cats will play at 7 p.m. Nov. 10 at St. Mary's High School and at 1:30 p.m. Nov. 19 in Fred Bramlage Coliseum.

Bowlers compete in tourney

K-State's bowling teams competed in the Mid-States Tournament this weekend in Kansas City, Mo. K-State finished 10th and 11th in the 12-team tournament.

The K-State men began strong, beating West Texas State behind Pat Klein's 267 game. After the first two rounds, the men were in fourth but slipped seven notches before the tournament concluded.

Tiger wins Big Eight award

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Strong safety Otis Smith of Missouri was chosen by a media panel the Big Eight's defensive player of the week for his work against Nebraska. Smith, a junior college transfer, had 10 tackles.

Fighting Irish vault to top spot

By The Associated Press

For the first time since 1981, the Fighting Irish of Notre Dame are on top of the college football world.

And since Monday's Associated Press poll finds Southern California right behind Notre Dame, it sets up what would be the 24th meeting between No. 1 and No. 2 when they meet on Nov. 26 in the Los Angeles Coliseum.

Before that can happen, however, Notre Dame, 8-0, must defeat Rice on Saturday and Penn State on Nov. 19 while Southern Cal, 7-0, has to beat California, Arizona State and UCLA, the former No. 1 team, which slipped to sixth in the wake of Saturday's 34-30 upset at the hands of Washington State.

Notre Dame, a 22-7 winner over Navy, received 44 of 58 first-place votes and 1,144 of a possible 1,160 points from a nationwide panel of sports writers and sportscasters. The Irish had been second behind UCLA the past two weeks. Southern Cal, a 41-20 winner over Oregon State, received 11 first-place votes and 1,097 points in climbing from third place to second.

Since the AP poll began in 1936, Notre Dame has won seven national championships, more than any other school. But the Irish haven't won a national championship since 1977 and were last ranked No. 1 after opening the 1981 season with a 27-9 victory over LSU. Notre Dame lost to Michigan 25-7 the following week and hasn't been higher than fourth until two weeks ago.

Notre Dame became the fourth team to be ranked No. 1 this season. Florida State was No. 1 in the preseason poll but lost its opener to Miami 31-0. Miami became No. 1 for six weeks before losing at Notre Dame 31-30. UCLA was No. 1 for two weeks.

Although the Top Ten in this week's poll are the same 10 teams as last week, there was considerable shuffling.

Miami's defending national champions moved from fourth place to third with one first-place vote and 1,041 points following a 31-7 triumph over East Carolina.

West Virginia leaped from seventh to fourth by routing Penn State 51-30. The Mountaineers, 8-0 for the first time in their 97-year football history, received the other two first-place votes and 950 points. West Virginia was as high as No. 4 twice during the 1983 season.

Florida State was idle but rose from sixth to fifth with 886 points, followed by UCLA with 847 points. Nebraska dropped from fifth to seventh with 835 points after struggling past Missouri 26-18.

Oklahoma trounced Kansas 63-14 and held onto eighth place with 739 points.

Diversity in audiences, music common to group

By Kathy Winklhofer
Collegian Reporter

Since 1954, the K-State Singers have been entertaining audiences at concerts, banquets, civic meetings and conventions about 40 times a year.

The Singers' performances include singing and dancing, as well as instrumental pieces. The group performs pop, Broadway show tunes, standards from the '30s and '40s, jazz, and a medley of commercial jingles, said Gerald Polich, associate professor of music and director of the K-State Singers.

Membership is limited to non-music majors and includes 12 vocalists, a percussionist, two guitarists, a pianist and a light and sound technician.

Six men and six women are in the group. Four of the women sing soprano and two sing alto. Four men sing bass and two sing tenor. Every singer has a partner.

"The partners are chosen by height and by singing part," said Karen Hight, sophomore in general life sciences and a K-State Singer. The couples sing duets and are dance partners.

The Singers practiced eight hours a day during the week before school started. Now the Singers practice two hours Monday through Thursday.

Members receive one hour of class credit. Membership lasts one year.

The Singers is a self-supporting organization. Members pay for transportation, wardrobes, props and other expenses with donations from the Alumni Association or with profits made from performances, Polich said.

This year the women perform in dresses with black-and-white plaid, full skirts and a black velvet bodice, with a matching black and white bow. The men wear a black tuxedo, with a matching black and white bow tie and cummerbund.

The Singers have performed six times this year, five of which were on the road. Its first concert was Oct. 6 and was performed for friends as a dress rehearsal on campus. It was to let the new Singers get used to performing in front of an audience, said Doug Wetzel, junior in secondary education and a Singer.

The Singers just concluded a tour of Western Kansas.

Saturday, the Singers performed with the K-State Glee Clubs for a Parents' Day Concert in McCain Auditorium.

The group will travel only in Kansas this year, appearing in several cities, including Kansas City, Kan., Wichita, Salina and Hiawatha, Polich said.

The group usually travels outside the state every other year. Last year, the group's main tour included Texas and Oklahoma. It performed in Oklahoma City, Tulsa, Galveston Island, Houston and Dallas, Wetzel said. The tour was a week after graduation.

"It gave us a chance to be with the graduating members for a little while longer," he said.

"Since we travel so much, we get to meet a ton of people," he said. "It also gives us a chance to tell other people about K-State."

Next year's group will tour the Southwest to cities such as Albuquerque, Phoenix and Los Angeles, Polich said.

The Singers travels in rented vans that also carry its instruments, costumes and other equipment.

Tryouts are every spring semester, usually during Open House weekend. The auditions are in two parts. In the preliminaries, the people auditioning sing two songs for Polich. There are usually about 125 people in that tryout, he said.

"I then narrow the group down to 30 people," he said.

Those 30 people are taught a song-and-dance combination to perform. The dances are taught by the K-State Singers' choreographer, Sharron Washington. The finalists then perform in front of a panel of K-State Singers' alumni. The alumni vote and give their votes to Polich. The final 12 are selected and notified by mail.

Engineering student receives $5,000 academic scholarship

By The Collegian Staff

To a busy student, applying for scholarships can be time-consuming, but for Claudia Maldonado, senior in industrial engineering, the effort has paid off.

Maldonado is the recipient of a $5,000 Kraft/LULAC scholarship administered by the League of United Latin American Citizens Educational Services Centers.

She is one of only 10 students in the United States to win the prestigious scholarship for 1988-90.

In awarding the scholarships, LULAC encourages and increases individual academic successes by Hispanic students.

Maldonado, whose parents emigrated from Colombia, is a graduate of Bishop Carroll High School in Wichita and is a fourth-year student in the College of Engineering.

"I almost didn't apply for the scholarship, but I was greatly encouraged by Jose Pereles, director of the Minority Engineering program, and Tom Cummings, director of MACAESA, (Mid-America Consortium of Engineering and Science Achievement), who gave me excellent references," she said.

In addition to letters of reference, Maldonado submitted an essay outlining the effects of her studies on her future goals. She also completed an extensive application detailing her extracurricular activities.

Maldonado, whose goals after college include working with computers and statistics, said she encourages other students to apply for available scholarships.

"A lot of students are turned off when they see the high dollar amounts available on some scholarships," she said. "It can be frightening to think of winning that much money, but you never know until you try."

"I hope other minority engineering students will consider applying for the LULAC scholarship next year," said Jose Pereles. "It would set a wonderful tradition if a K-State student could win it every year."

lege's total came from physics, biology, chemistry and biochemistry.

The College of Veterinary Medicine increased its extramural support from about $375,000 to $653,000, an increase of nearly 74 percent. This pushed the college up to support levels it had not had since the federal government discontinued capitation payments in 1984.

With the exception of the College of Business Administration, which exceeded the $100,000 mark for the first time, all other colleges declined in support in 1988.

"You almost expect a lull," Lowman said. "The declines were modest and might better be described as essentially level funding."

1988 figures for K-State's peers are not yet available, but, in 1986, K-State's peer institutions each received between $24.3 million and $41.9 million in extramural support from the federal government alone. These figures exclude all awards in non-science/engineering disciplines, all awards for public service, and all awards from non-federal sources.

K-State received $16 million, $8.3 million less than its closest peer institution.

"We have probably narrowed the funding gap between us and our peers since 1986, but the gap certainly still exists," Lowman said. "To continue the success of the past four years and to achieve equality with peers in extramural funding will require attention to some limiting factors in the K-State funding environment.

"The faculty needs tangible support from the administration, such as increased salaries, travel money and increased support for graduate students. We need to have the faculty be creative and be able to do its work, instead of worrying about where the money for test tubes is going to come from or for some journals."

A step which might help the faculty in seeking more support is the newly created position of vice-provost for research and dean of the Graduate School. A search committee has been formed and is looking for someone to fill the position, Lowman said.

The new position will take some of the pressure from the faculty members by facilitating their efforts, said James R. Coffman, University provost.

"The new position will help streamline the pre-award system and augment faculty effort in procuring federal and state research grants," Coffman said. "The three to four hours a faculty member puts into grantsmanship will show more."

With the creation of the new position, the faculty will have a common pathway for proposals and be able to coordinate and keep track of all of them, he said.

Wednesday: An in-depth look at the position of vice-provost and the effects it will have on the Graduate School.

everyone.

"To me, it seems to be growing," she said. Ten to 20 people have been at the meetings.

Unlike the University of Kansas, K-State traditionally has not had political parties, although they have existed in the past.

Political parties were most active at K-State in the late '60s and early '70s, said Pat Bosco, Associate Vice President for Institutional Advancement and Dean of Student Life and 1970-71 K-State student body president.

"In the late 1960s, there were several very active campus political parties," he said.

"Party affiliation may have made it easier (to run for office then)," Bosco said. Political parties gave candidates a political base and a platform on which to run, as well as a built-in constituency.

Bosco also said campaigns lasted much longer. Candidates campaigned as long as three months, giving them the opportunity to build a large constituency.

Past SGA political parties include the Independent University Party in 1968 and the Humanity Party in 1971.

Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities, said since she began working with K-State student government in 1982, parties have not been successful because students run on the basis of individual merit, not on party platforms.

sent. Johnson said there are no other suspects in the case.

Miller was found dead in her home by her husband's secretary. An autopsy showed she had been stabbed 19 times and died as a result of a slashed throat. Miller's 16-month-old daughter, Emily, was the only other person in the house when her mother's body was discovered.

Miller was married to then city judge Paul Miller, who is now a Riley County district judge.

Jayhawks punished with 3-year probation

NCAA cites recruiting violations

By Tom Morris
Sports Editor

SALINA — For 40 minutes Tuesday night in the Bicentennial Center, the University of Kansas men's basketball team and its coach were able to put the NCAA probation out of their minds and concentrate on the game that just seven months ago had led the Jayhawks to being the toast of the nation.

In front of 2,364 partisan KU fans, the Jayhawks played a scrimmage amidst a sea of national championship paraphernalia.

Returning players such as Scooter Barry and Milt Newton looked to be in mid-season form. KU's new coach Roy Williams said he liked what he saw in the scrimmage as well.

But when the final buzzer sounded, it was time to return to reality.

"I've had a lot better days," Williams said.

Earlier Tuesday, the defending Division I-A champions were put on three-year probation by the NCAA for recruiting violations. In addition to being barred from postseason play in the first year of probation, the 'Hawks will not be allowed to have paid recruiting visits in 1989 and will be stripped of one scholarship during that period.

The NCAA also ordered the school to "show cause" why it should not be penalized further if it fails to disassociate three unnamed boosters from the program "based upon their involvement in violations of NCAA rules."

The NCAA seriously considered imposing the "death penalty," which would have shut down the basketball program for the entire year. Only Southern Methodist University's football program in Texas has been hit with that punishement.

David Berst, assistant NCAA director for enforcement, even said Kansas was "on the bubble" when the association considered the "death penalty," but no violations involved any of the players on the 1988-89 roster. KU also has no chance to appeal the decision.

"I was really surprised at the severity of the sanctions," Williams said. "I had no idea it would be anything like that. I still don't completely understand it."

"It hit me like a ton of bricks. I knew (probation) was something that could happen. I thought I wasn't going to be seriously affected by it, but I am."
—Milt Newton
KU basketball player

Williams even pondered the fate of KU's other sports. Kansas is similar to K-State in that basketball provides a majority of the athletic department's revenue.

"I wonder what this will do to our football team," Williams said. "I know there wasn't anyone pulling for us any harder than (football coach) Glen Mason and his players."

The news struck KU's players just as hard.

"It hit me like a ton of bricks," Newton said. "I knew (probation) was something that could happen. I thought I wasn't going to be seriously affected by it, but I am."

The report issued by the NCAA infractions committee said the investigation that uncovered the violations at Kansas was started by an telephone call from a "confidential informant," dealing with the recruitment of a "highly visible transfer student-athlete."

Reports have linked former Memphis State guard Vincent Askew to the probe although the NCAA announcement did not identify anyone. Askew was recruited by former KU coach Larry Brown, now with the NBA's San Antonio Spurs, and spent the summer of 1986 on campus. He then returned to Memphis without playing for the 'Hawks.

"I'm upset that the violations done by (Brown's) staff, the new staff has to pay for it," Barry said.

Kansas must make annual reports on action it is taking during the probationary period to bring its program into compliance with NCAA rules, including a full audit of athletes' summer jobs. It also must make annual reports on wages and salaries paid to players employed in university summer camps and camps operated by the school's athletic staff.

The NCAA said violations included improper inducements, with a total value of at least $1,244 to the unnamed recruit, including clothing and airline tickets.

KU could still play in the Big Eight Conference's postseaon tournament if the other conference schools agree to it.

KU Chancellor Gene A. Budig released a prepared statement to the media.

"The University of Kansas has total confidence in Coach Williams and his ability to recruit quality student athletes. ... It is important that the University community now unite behind the new coach and his basketball program," the statement said.

The Associated Press contributed to this report.

New position to create lobbying presence

By Scott Miller
Special Projects Editor

Editor's note: This is the second of a three-part series on the Graduate School.

The selection of members for a search committee to fill the newly-created position of vice provost for research and dean of the Graduate School was announced Friday by James Coffman, University provost.

Coffman said the new position will establish a more consistent lobbying presence in Washington, D.C. He said the present dean of the Graduate School was able to donate only 20 percent of his time to procuring research grants.

The current situation provides "a minimal amount of resources to bear on the problem" of finding research grants, he said.

"There was a shortfall," Coffman said. "We don't have the consistent lobbying presence in Washington we need."

The new position should provide for maximum facilitation and coordination of research, Coffman said.

"This all comes under my broad heading of coordination," he said. "It will provide a common starting point to keep inventory of research proposals and coordinate lobbying efforts with that."

Robert Kruh, the current dean of the Graduate School, will become vice provost for academic services, Coffman said.

Although Kruh said there has not been a problem obtaining research grants, improvements could be made to obtain more lucrative grants. The new position should facilitate this process, he said.

"We would have a more active presence in Washington with the agencies that are involved with research," he said.

Kruh said the change of position would not affect him significantly.

"There will be a name change, but there won't be a significant change of responsibilities. It's essentially just a formalization of what I've already been doing. It's not something that will cause a great deal of dislocation as far as I'm concerned," he said.

Coffman said most of K-State's peer institutions have a similar position.

"Almost everyone has some central coordinating entity except us," he said.

The salary for the new position would come from internal reallocation, Coffman said. The University could employ a classified clerical worker instead of hiring secretarial support to save money.

Sue Blodgett, graduate student in entomology and president of graduate student council, is a member of the selection committee. She said she was pleased a graduate student was included in the selection process.

"I think it's really great that graduate students are being included in the process," Blodgett said.

Blodgett said the selection committee will meet for the first time today, and will make its candidate selection by the early part of next year.

She said the council has not discussed the effect the new position will have on graduate students, but said it should make the administration more responsive to the needs of

Campus planning discussed

Faculty, students offer ideas

By Becky Ives
Staff Writer

Creating more green space and improving parking were among topics discussed Tuesday night at the K-State Preservation Society meeting. The Society met to discuss long-range planning for the University.

"The purpose of this meeting, instead of getting information from the planning committee, is to give student and faculty feedback back to the committee," said Mark Lamzik, president of the society.

Seven people attended the meeting in Bluemont Hall to discuss with Lamzik and Donald Coner, vice president of the preservation committee, ideas of what they considered the most important elements of the University.

Lamzik said the two goals of the long-range planning committee were to increase the amount of open space on the campus and eliminate as much of the vehicular traffic as possible.

"(The committee) is trying to open up green spaces," Coner said.

In 1940, there were large, open spaces to the north, south and east of the library, he said. The committee would like to open these green spaces again. In order to do that, it is planning to take out some buildings and put in others.

■ The long-range plan of K-State includes the renovation of Holton Hall, Dickens Hall and Seaton Hall. It calls for the eventual demolition of Memorial Stadium, Seaton Court, Lafene Student Health Center, the power plant, and Waters Hall Annex.

■ The plan also includes additions to the following buildings: McCain Auditorium, Calvin Hall, Justin Hall, Throckmorton Hall, Ackert Hall, Durland Hall, Leasure Hall, Seaton Hall, Farrell Library, Chemistry/Biochemistry Building and the Union.

The long-range planning covers a period of 30 years, and the projected cost for the first five-year schedule is $61.6 million.

Larry Garvin, director of Facilities Planning, was scheduled to discuss the progress that has been made in the "dream plan" of K-State. However, he was unable to attend.

Commission passes request to designate bus stops

By Angela J. Smith
Collegian Reporter

Manhattan City Commission passed a request from Manhattan Transportation Inc., Tuesday to designate certain locations as bus stops and remove on-street parking that may conflict with a bus loading zone.

Larry Fronce, president of Manhattan Transportation Inc., requested temporary bus stops at 401 Poyntz Ave., Triangle Park in Aggieville, and Prairie Glen, east of Prairie Lea Street.

"The bus will stop at two dormitory locations," Fronce said.

The stops will be at Denison Avenue in the driveway of Marlatt Hall and at the residence halls along north Manhattan Avenue, he said.

The bus line will serve all major retail areas within the Manhattan area for holiday shopping, Fronce said.

It will stop at various locations, including Picnic Place in Manhattan Town Center, K mart, Wal-Mart, Candlewood shopping area, Westloop shopping center, and the Village Plaza between Alco and Food Barn.

The bus will operate on Fridays, Saturdays and Sundays from Nov. 25 to Dec. 24.

Fronce said the bus will run from 9 a.m. to 7 p.m. on Fridays and Saturdays and from 1 to 7 p.m. on Sundays.

"The bus will run every two hours on the same route," he said. "The cost for the bus is 75 cents for one ride. It will cost $1 from Ogden and $2 for an all-day pass."

Commissioner Kent Glasscock said, "I think the bus system is a good idea. The bus stops at residential areas and the Ogden area and connects these with the principal shop-

San Salvador leftists attack

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador — Leftist rebels launched a daring mortar and rifle attack Tuesday on National Guard headquarters, killing four soldiers and wounding 37 people, including the guard commander, the Defense Ministry said.

Col. Jose Galileo Torres told The Associated Press that rebel mortar fire set off grenades stored inside the main building in the compound during the 45-minute attack. Firefighters were able to extinguish the blaze, he said.

One of two parked cars loaded with explosives blew up about a block from the site in northern San Salvador, a defense ministry spokesman said. Army munitions experts deactivated explosives in the second vehicle, the spokesman said on condition of anonymity.

Among the injured were four civilians.

National Guard commander Col. Jose Humberto Gomez received a shrapnel wound in a leg, the spokesman said.

Activists to protest closings

GDANSK, Poland — Solidarity activists, adopting a measured response to the government order to close the Lenin shipyard in this port city, said Tuesday they wanted to meet with management to seek a reversal of the decision.

They said they would protest the planned closing but would not call an immediate strike.

"We are not in a hurry," said Solidarity founder Lech Walesa, interviewed by telephone at his Gdansk apartment.

Government spokesman Jerzy Urban said earlier Tuesday that authorities are prepared for strikes to protest the closing.

He said such disruptions would be a normal consequence of reforming the economy and would not be treated "like an earthquake" as in the past.

The government announced Monday that Poland's biggest shipyard, where the now-outlawed Solidarity free trade union movement was born in August 1980, would be closed for economic reasons Dec. 1.

Prank hanging turns deadly

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — In a ghastly Halloween prank gone awry, a man trying to stage a fake hanging choked to death in a bar full of revelers who didn't realize he was dying before their eyes.

"He had some sort of Halloween attire that was going to make it look as though he was hanging himself when he really wasn't," said Police Detective James Dwyer.

"The harness slipped and he really was hanging, but it took the crowd a while to realize what was happening. ... When our officers arrived, he was down — someone had cut him down — but it was too late."

Michael Tyree, 41, of Cambridge, was rushed from the Cantab Lounge, a neighborhood bar, to Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston late Monday. He was pronounced dead Tuesday morning after a night of efforts by doctors to revive him, said hospital spokesman Martin Bander.

Bar owner Richard Fitzgerald said he stopped Tyree from performing the trick once.

"He came in dressed in a Halloween costume — he looked like some kind of a creature, I don't know what he was supposed to be — and he had a noose round his neck with about a 6-inch rope," Fitzgerald said.

Vandal may be 'sentenced'

PARSONS — Police are looking for a poor-spelling culprit who vandalized a church and are threatening to sentence the person to school if caught.

Someone spray-painted the word "Satin" and several symbols on the front steps of St. Mary's Catholic Church on Halloween night.

Neal Wilkerson, the police chief of this southeast Kansas town, thinks the culprit intended to write the word "Satan."

"If we find the kid who did this, he should be sentenced to another year of middle school so he can learn how to spell," Wilkerson said.

It was not determined if there was any connection to a vandalism report a few months ago when the words "Kill for Satin" were spray-painted on a vehicle.

State census figures revised

TOPEKA — Secretary of State Bill Graves delivered to the Legislature Tuesday final figures from the special state census his office was instructed to conduct this year to provide updated population counts for reapportioning the Kansas House in the 1989 session.

The only figures that are not final, Graves said, are those for Wyandotte County. At the request of Mayor Joe Steineger of Kansas City, Kan., Graves said, his office "is continuing to review figures for Wyandotte County."

The final figures vary slightly from those made public by Graves on Oct. 7. Most cities appeared to have gained a handful of residents in the revised figures.

The final report gave the state 5,682 more residents than the report did last month, a new total of 2,291,780 as of Jan. 1, 1988, when the state census was taken. In October, Graves reported a total for the state of 2,286,098.

Graves said last month the figures would be revised slightly, mainly to accommodate a survey of residence hall students at the University of Kansas and K-State to ask them if they considered themselves residents of Lawrence and Manhattan.

That special survey of students increased the Lawrence population by 907 residents, from a reported 44,073 last month to 44,980 in the final report.

However, it raised Manhattan's population by just 26 people, from 24,230 last month to 24,256.

K.C. building ready for Royal

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Everything may not be exactly up to date for Kansas City's American Royal, but officials say all is ready to go for the 90th edition of the big livestock and horse show.

There has been growing concern about the condition of the Royal's 66-year-old building. A recent report by city architect Tom Bean said it had deteriorated to such an extent "that consideration must be given to closing the facility after this year's event."

The city has been unable to come up with enough money to make more than temporary repairs. Replacement of the aging building would cost an estimated $15 million.

Mayor Richard Berkley and other city leaders joined officials of the livestock show at a news conference Monday to announce that minor repairs have been completed and the building is ready for Friday's opening.

"If we had any doubt about the safety of the structure, we would close it," said George Saterlee, director of public works. Berkley said that while the building has some problems, "it's safe to be here."

Correction

Due to photographers' errors, the pictures of three candidates for Student Senate were omitted from the special pages in Tuesday's Collegian devoted to student government elections. These were Ajit Maan, candidate for Senate in the College of Arts and Sciences and Board of Student Publications; Loren Sheets, candidate for Senate in the College of Engineering; and Gregg A. Hinthorn, candidate for Board of Student Publications.

Due to an error in the Campus Directory, Elisha Perry, candidate for Senate in the College of Human Ecology, was incorrectly classified as a freshman in pre-occupational therapy. Perry is a sophomore in radio-television.

Union president wants action on farm loan policy

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — National Farmers Union President Leland Swenson wants to make sure 90,000 eligible producers nationwide — 1,900 of them in Kansas — act quickly when they get Farmers Home Administration notices offering to consider restructuring their delinquent loans.

During an interview in Wichita Tuesday, Swenson said once borrowers are notified, they have 45 days to complete the nine forms in the mailed packet and return them to FmHA.

"If they do not, they lose their appeal rights. If they do not, they lose their restructuring rights," he said.

FmHA is anticipating a low response rate, Swenson said.

The notices are required by federal legislation intended to provide farmers and ranchers with an opportunity to restructure their delinquent loans where that would be more cost effective than foreclosure.

Swenson, 40, a former southwest Minnesota farmer, was elected NFU president in March. He served about six years as South Dakota Farmers Union president. He was in Kansas Tuesday attending county Farmers Union meetings and getting acquainted.

"I see us having a window of opportunity to be able to bring different segments of our society together and have shared goals and shared values."
—Leland Swenson
National Farmers Union President

"I see us having a window of opportunity to be able to bring different segments of our society together and have shared goals and shared values," Swenson said.

The drafting of the 1990 farm bill is one example of an area where consumer and agricultural interests can be balanced. People want a dependable food supply without wild price fluctuations and farmers want to stay away from programs that generate market-depressing oversupplies, Swenson said.

With its 250,000 farm family members in 25 states, NFU is less than a fourth the size of the American Farm Bureau Federation. Swenson says that doesn't mean the Farmers Union doesn't have clout in Washington.

"Numbers don't mean anything when you talk about good sound reasoning and addressing the situations that exist," he said.

The Farmers Union has strongly supported reducing the cost of farm programs, which is a position with bipartisan support, Swenson said. The NFU expects to play a major role in shaping the 1990 farm bill by proposing creative solutions to the leaders who will be drafting the measure, he said.

Swenson said a Mike Dukakis presidency would be best for farmers since Dukakis and a Democratic Congress would differ less philosophically on agricultural issues.

Drought responsible for seed shortage

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The summer drought and the government's decision to boost 1989 crop production will mean sharply smaller supplies of corn and soybean seed for spring planting, seed company executives meeting here said.

"Corn, in particular, is going to be in the tightest supply that I've ever seen in 20 years in the seed business," said Dean Douglas, an executive with NCHybrids, a Lincoln, Neb., seed production company.

About 1,000 seed company executives from across the United States and Canada and western Europe are attending the 89th annual Western Seedmen's Association meeting, which began last weekend and ends today.

Douglas said seed corn could be in even shorter supply than it was in the 1970s when farmers and seed producers discovered that at least three-fourths of the seeds used then were susceptible to a fatal leaf blight that ravaged one-fourth of the 1970 crop. Seed companies moved quickly both to develop resistant varieties and to spread growing fields farther apart to cut risk.

The U.S. Agriculture Department estimates that at least half the nation's planned seed corn crop was lost this summer in key states such as Iowa, Illinois, Indiana and Ohio. Seed fields for soybeans, wheat and other farm crops also were hurt by the drought, although not as badly.

Drought damage was less severe in states such as Nebraska, where many fields are irrigated. Also, many large U.S. seed companies can turn to fields in the Southeast or to specially planted winter fields in Mexico and other Latin American countries to try to make up lost production.

Compact discs grow in popularity

By Alan Wilds
Collegian Reporter

Compact discs, the latest music reproduction innovation, has followed a long evolutionary chain, which has included long-playing and single records, 8-track tapes and cassettes.

CD technology is constantly being updated and, according to current trends, seem be more popular then ever among area music stores and radio stations.

Chris Lawrence, program director at KSKT 95.3 FM, said CDs are an advantage to the station because they take up less space and hold more music. "They are a breeze for DJs to use," he said, referring to the CD random access feature.

KSKT runs about one-half of its programming on CDs. "All of our current music is usually received on the new three-inch CD singles," Lawrence said.

CD fidelity over the air is much better then tapes, according to Lawrence. "The sound is excellent, you get much more of the highs and lows."

CDs have a much greater capacity then tapes or records. One CD can hold up to 120 minutes of programming.

"You can put an entire symphony on one CD, whereas you cannot do that with records and tapes," he said.

The price of CDs is declining every month, according to Trina Godbout, manager of Musicland at Manhattan Town Center.

"The current price for a new CD release is $12 to $15," Godbout said.

She added that among records,tapes and CDs, about 40 percent of Musicland's sales comes from CDs, with the new releases from Bon Jovi, Kenny G., Bobby McFerrin, U2 and the Cocktail soundtrack being the most popular right now.

In addition to the new hits, noncurrent music is making a comeback through CDs. Greg Harris, coowner of the Sound Shop in Aggieville, said that he is seeing an increase in sales of CDs containing older music, which are in the price range of $11.50 to $12.50.

The older releases have been digitally remastered on CDs, Harris said.

Since CDs can carry double what records can, they experience very strong sales, Harris said. "We have seen a dramatic decrease in LP sales."

The Sound Shop total sales are 20 percent albums, with the other 40 percent being split evenly between cassettes and CDs.

The actual life of CDs is not certain. "No one really has any idea how long a CD will last," Lawrence said. He explained that they must be treated with the same care as a record because they can be scratched if handled improperly.

The quality of a CD can sometimes be determined by holding the disc up to a light and looking for pinholes on the surface. He said the fewer pinholes the better. "There is also a possibility that the aluminum writing on some discs is damaging to them."

"There is always constant modification being done on compact discs," Godbout said.

The three-inch disc with a 17-minute capacity is now on sale at area stores.

Lawrence said that more attention is devoted to the sound quality of CDs than when they first came out. "Companies were just slapping

Best interests of student body should prevail

This is the last topic I wanted to write about, but some recent concerns about an ever-present problem have compelled me to do so. I am sorry to state that the very newspaper through which I am communicating to you also participates in carrying out discrimination. But it is not the only one. I chose the example of the Collegian because it best reflects the general attitude existing on campus.

Consider the report on Sunday's student body presidential debate which was covered by the Collegian on Monday. The reporter, for some unexplained reasons, singled out the issues raised by a particular segment of students.

The issues which were discussed, but ignored by the Collegian, mainly consisted of scholarships for students from other countries, priority on-campus housing for these students and equitable representation in the student government.

If I do a little backtracking, I find the campus newspaper using discriminatory language, such as using "Moslem terrorists" instead of "terrorists." I also find the newspaper completely neglecting the well-organized and well-publicized International Week celebrated in the Union last semester.

Also during International Week, some students demonstrated the game cricket on campus. The Manhattan Mercury bothered to do a story on cricket, the Collegian did not.

It would be inappropriate if I did not mention that the policies of the Collegian regarding news coverage, as I know, are as liberal as they could be. But it always comes down to a single person making the decision to print a photograph of a half-naked greek student sitting in the window of a greek house or to cover an educational and healthy event like International Week.

Obviously, there are people at the Collegian, as well as all over campus, who are mature and understanding enough to look beyond certain irrelevant characteristics. The presence of my printed words in this newspaper reflects this fact very well. All this discussion does not apply to the Collegian only but it reflects to different extents the attitude and behavior of other institutions and students on campus.

I have always resented the idea of labeling and treating a certain segment of students as international students, or minority students, for that matter. Categorization of students from other countries as international students is useful for statistical purposes but it is often carried too far when it comes to availability of opportunities for K-Staters. I hope this article is not taken as an argument for rights of students from other countries.

I do not believe that coming from different backgrounds blesses someone with special rights. But I do believe that differing backgrounds should not impair one's access to opportunities others enjoy. Unfortunately, there is a tendency to separate a segment of students and discriminate against them by depriving them of certain opportunities on this campus. It shows up when it comes to granting scholarships, job opportunities on campus, encouraging activities of students and in inequitable representation in the Student Senate.

There is a very simple solution to this problem which does not call for reserved seats for minorities in the Student Senate or giving special treatment to a certain population. The solution is to act normal when you meet any fellow student. Think of students on the K-State campus as fellow students only. I speak from my personal experience when I say that you will be surprised to find how much you can share and learn from your college life. Replace competition with cooperation and grin with courtesy.

The structure of student government at K-State requires a certain level of maturity and understanding on the part of the representatives and student body voters to make the system work for the good of the whole community — a community diverse enough to consist of 1,400 students from other countries, a growing number of non-traditional students, and much more. I have no doubt that such a level of maturity and understanding exists. All that needs to be done is to invoke it.

The need of the hour is that students be represented by candidates who bring diversity to the student body. This does not necessarily mean electing minority students. A representative who is ready to listen and respond to the needs of any student is my definition of a good leader.

Fortunately this election year we have at least two candidates, Laurian Cuffy and Sally Howard-Clayton running for the student body president, who are fully capable of leading the diverse K-State student body for the next year. Other candidates simply did not impress me.

I hope you have already voted for the candidates of your choice. If not, you better grab your fee card and head for a polling station.

A little piece of advice for greek students, in case you don't know: only God is watching you when you vote, so vote as K-Staters for whom you think is best suited for the job.

Brown leaves town; Kansas takes blame

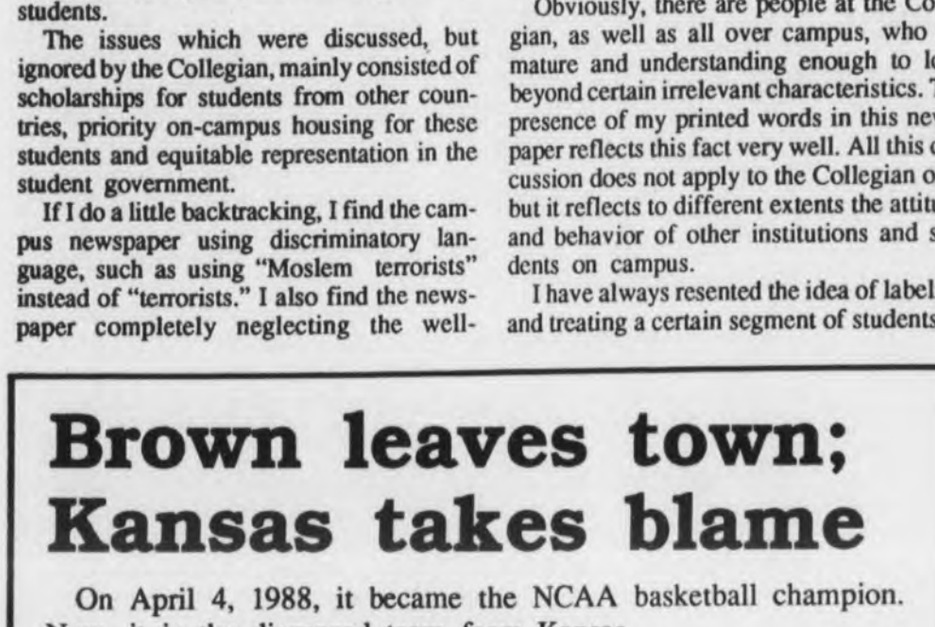
On April 4, 1988, it became the NCAA basketball champion. Now, it is the disgraced team from Kansas.

The team that will not be allowed to participate in any post-season play during the coming season; the team that will not be allowed to give any paid campus recruiting visits in 1989; the team that will have one scholarship taken away during the same period — yes, the University of Kansas basketball team has fallen from its pedestal.

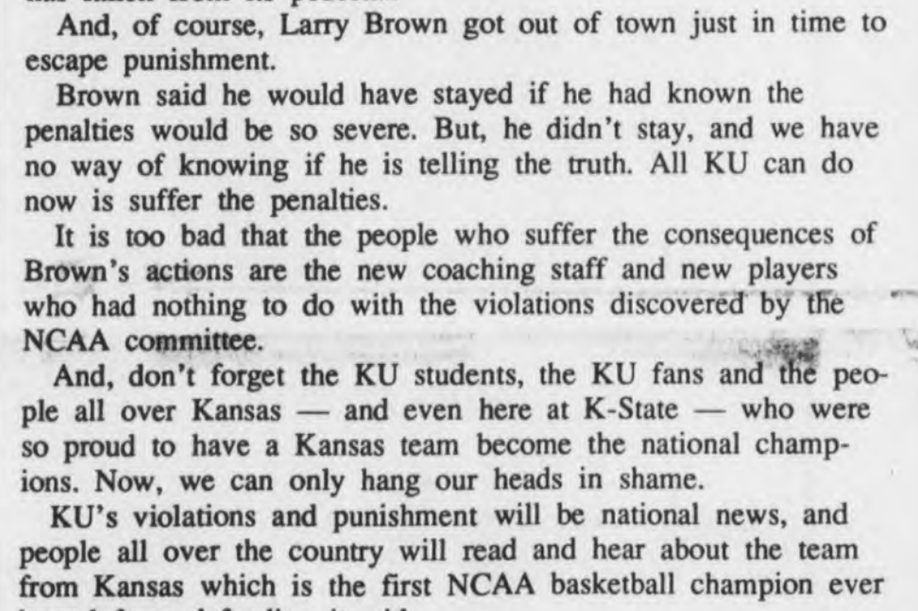
And, of course, Larry Brown got out of town just in time to escape punishment.

Brown said he would have stayed if he had known the penalties would be so severe. But, he didn't stay, and we have no way of knowing if he is telling the truth. All KU can do now is suffer the penalties.

It is too bad that the people who suffer the consequences of Brown's actions are the new coaching staff and new players who had nothing to do with the violations discovered by the NCAA committee.



And, don't forget the KU students, the KU fans and the people all over Kansas — and even here at K-State — who were so proud to have a Kansas team become the national champions. Now, we can only hang our heads in shame.



KU's violations and punishment will be national news, and people all over the country will read and hear about the team from Kansas which is the first NCAA basketball champion ever barred from defending its title.

Just over seven months ago, KU was giving our state a good name. It felt good to have people from other states talking about Kansas. It felt good to know that "we" were the best at something.

Now, we have lost that. And, the man who caused us to lose that will be in San Antonio for the next five years, earning $3.5 million.

Somehow, this ending does not seem like the one the NCAA intended. The guilty party is free to do as he chooses, and the innocent parties, including the state of Kansas, are taking the blame.

Letters

Reader unhappy

Editor,

I am dissatisfied with your services. As a result of your training and the thought patterns required for newspaper editing, your thinking has been straitjacketed. About one month ago, I wrote a letter which focused on several aspects of one issue. Unfortunately for me, you were only capable of seeing one dimension and omitted the main point due to a lack of space. I briefly explained this to a member of your staff.

Two days later, you published a response which attached an aspect of my letter that was intended to serve merely as a catalyst for my main point. I then wrote a second letter to clarify the whole situation and drive the main point home. You failed to recognize your error and did not publish the letter. Upon inquiry I was told, "We don't carry arguments between people ... if you want to do that you can get together. ..."

At this point you denied the existence or importance of the thousands of Collegian readers who also missed the point, thanks to you.

I'm not trying to pull that issue out of the glove, but would like the readers to be aware that what is seen in print is not always the correct or full story.

Whales important

Editor,

Your editorial on the three whales trapped in the Alaskan ice is an example of the short-sighted, me-first attitude of the American public.

Obviously an argument can be made that three whales represent an insignificant part of the whale population, but it resulted in recognizing the situation and brought about an awareness that is necessary for environmental protection.

The environment we live in is the only one we have. By ignoring the environment and focusing all of our efforts and resources on "humanistic" concerns, ironically, we forfeit the one thing humanity depends on. Giving the people a sound economy, medical cures and an unlimited food supply means nothing without a healthy and productive ecological cycle.

Protecting the environment, then, should be our foremost concern.

Certainly Reagan is no environmentalist, nor do his policies indicate any administrative concern. But before any policy changes can be taken to protect the environment and, more specifically, the slaughter of whales for their blubber, the public must be made conscious of the need to do so.

Thus, our President's efforts to jump on the bandwagon to save three whales must be applauded. Such a move is indeed only a token of support, but it does serve to further an environmental consciousness.

Whether or not "Reagan goes down as the president who tried to save the whales" is trivial. A better analysis would be that Reagan may go down as unknowingly promoting an environmental ethic — an ethic necessary for the prevention of our own self-destruction.

Few nesting places

Editor,

The article "Duck Drought" in the Thursday issue of the Collegian was very informative. However, the article only focused on one cause of the waterfowl problem.

The major cause of the decreasing waterfowl population is not the fault of hunters or Mother Nature's cruel drought. The problem lies in the destruction of these animals' natural nesting grounds by development and agriculture. Just to get a few extra acres of farmland or to build a house, these farmers and developers drain the marshy grassland where the waterfowl must nest to protect her eggs from predators. This destruction of natural nesting area forces the waterfowl to nest in less secure areas, which causes a low survival rate of the offspring.

If the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service wants to protect these animals, they need to start looking at the cause of the problem and establish wildlife preserves for these birds. The more time the Service spends trying to frustrate hunters and measure rainfall, the more nesting grounds are being destroyed, which is the real cause behind the 18 percent decrease in the waterfowl population.

Collegian Editorial Policies

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR are always encouraged. Those which pertain to matters of campus and/or public interest are especially encouraged, and are given the highest priority.

Letters should be kept as brief as possible, preferably under 300 words. Those who cannot condense their opinions should consider submiting their letter in the form of a guest column. All letters are subject to editing for space, style and taste.

GUEST COLUMNS are also encouraged. The column should be no longer than two double-spaced, typed pages. If the submission is used as a column and not a letter to the editor, it will be accompanied by the author's photograph.

Third political party candidates face challenges

Kansas' 2-word title, ballot law hinders third political parties

By Scott Miller
Special Projects Editor

While many third political parties say it is difficult to overcome ballot restrictions, at least one election law in Kansas makes it impossible for many third parties to get their names on the ballot.

The law, Kansas statute 25-304, requires political parties on the ballot to have two-word names, one of which must be the word "party."

The law states, "Party certificates of nomination shall designate in not more than two words of which the word 'party' shall be one, the political party which the convention, primary election or caucus making the nominations represented."

Examples include "Republican Party," "Democratic Party," "People's Party," "Populist Party," and "Prohibition Party." The law also prohibits compound or hyphenated names.

John Reinhart, press secretary for Kansas Secretary of State Bill Graves, said he had "no idea" why political parties in Kansas are required to have two-word names.

Richard Winger, field representative for the Coalition for Free and Open Elections and publisher of Ballot Access News, said he was not familiar with the history of the law, but that he said it could have something to do with Eugene Debs' presidential campaign on the Socialist Democrat Party ticket. Debs ran in 1900, and the law was passed in 1901.

COFE is a nonpartisan organization which monitors third-party and independent candidates. Ballot Access News is a monthly newsletter which covers third-party and independent candidates.

Winger said Kansas and Maryland are the only states which limit the number of words in a political party's name. He said the law has probably never been challenged.

Annie Roboff, press secretary for presidential candidate Lenora Fulani, called the law "ridiculous."

Fulani, who is running on the New Alliance Party ticket in most states, is an independent candidate in Kansas because of the law and because requirements in Kansas are more restrictive for third parties than for independents.

James Warren, presidential candidate of the Socialist Workers Party, is not on the ballot in Kansas as an independent and the SWP is not a recognized political party in Kansas.

Greg McCartan, spokesman for the SWP, said efforts were not made in Kansas to get the SWP's candidates on the ballot. However, he said the law was typical of laws in every state designed to limit ballot access to the two major parties.

Barry Porster, the vice-presidential candidate of the Workers League, said his party had avoided similar laws in other states by changing the party's name to Workers Party.

Lawsuit may shift coverage

By Scott Miller
Special Projects Editor

Although the November elections will decide who will be the next president of the United States, one third-party candidate has filed a lawsuit which could significantly affect the news media coverage of future election campaigns.

After the Commission on Presidential Debates barred her from participating in this year's debates, third-party candidate Lenora Fulani filed a lawsuit charging the commission with discrimination.

Fulani, who is running for president on the New Alliance Party ticket, claims the commission barred her from the debates for partisan reasons.

If a federal court rules in Fulani's favor, it could mean more access to the presidential debates for third-party and independent candidates.

Lewis Loss, attorney for the commission, would not comment directly on Fulani's lawsuit. However, he said he was confident "the litigation will show that the commission has been non-partisan."

"The commission determined the educational purpose would best be served by allowing only the two (candidates) who have a realistic chance to win the election," Loss said.

The Fulani campaign disagrees.

"They claim to be non-partisan, but everyone and their mother knows they're bipartisan," said Annie Roboff, Fulani's press secretary.

Fulani's name, like that of 1980 independent presidential candidate John Anderson, has been placed on the ballot in 50 states and the District of Columbia. Her supporters maintain that, like Anderson, Fulani should have been allowed to participate in the nationally televised debates.

Loss said the fact that Fulani was on the ballot in 50 states and the District of Columbia did not affect the Commission's decision.

He said that without a realistic chance, the commission had no obligation to allow Fulani to participate.

Despite the fact that a federal judge granted Fulani a trial, a temporary injunction which would have allowed her to participate in the debates was denied.

The lawsuit charges that excluding Fulani from the presidential debates violates Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, which prohibit discrimination on the basis of gender.

Fulani also charged the IRS with violating the IRS code for organizations with tax-exempt status and the League of Women Voters with violating its own nonpartisan charter.

The League of Women Voters, which was responsible for the second debate, withdrew its sponsorship because of what it considered self-serving demands from the Democratic and Republican campaigns, a spokesman for the group said.

Phil Nordhus for President

K-State means a lot to us as students. Our campus is an educational structure that requires a comfortable atmosphere for our learning.
As Student Body President I would help make decisions that accommodate our diverse student body, and do my best to protect the student needs.
I've enjoyed being a part of Kansas State University, and look forward to seeing us continue bringing progress to our campus.
Thank You for letting me share in our experience.
Sincerely,
Phil Nordhus

Student soliders useful to army

By Becky Jones
Collegian Reporter

Offering soldiers who are stationed at Fort Riley the opportunity to attend college serves a dual purpose. It prepares soldiers for civilian careers and makes them more useful to the Army while they are on active duty.

Due to the growing technological sophistication of the Army, it needs soldiers with a college background, said Marty Kindsvatter, Fort Riley education counselor. So soldiers and the Army benefit when soldiers receive college educations.

"Like any business offering its employees assistance, the Army wants a payback," said William Canelos, Fort Riley education services officer. "The reality is: the Army wants a return for its investment.

"But what's beautiful about it is that when we do it, the Army gains because it gets a smarter person back, and the soldiers gain because they're going to take that experience wherever they go, whether they stay in the service or eventually go back into civilian life. If they decide to go to school full time, then they're that much ahead."

Fort Riley has seven education centers on the post that serve all the units, and 10 professional education counselors to help soldiers advance in the military.

"The whole purpose of us being here is to help soldiers improve themselves," Canelos said.

Kindsvatter said Fort Riley soldiers are required to talk to an education officer within the first couple of weeks they arrive on post. Counselors review soldiers' records and work with them to determine their educational goals and make them aware of the programs available, Kindsvatter said.

She said soldiers can earn college credit three ways while they are on active duty. They can take college classes at night, study for a College Level Examination Program test, or work on an independent study program.

To earn credit by taking classes, soldiers such as Spec. Wes Dolatta attend evening classes on the K-State campus. Dolatta said he joined the Army to earn money for college. When he is discharged in fall 1989, he will be able to use his Veterans' Administration educational benefits to pay for the rest of his college education.

"I had to sign up for four (years), but I think it will be worth it when I get out," he said.

For soldiers who cannot take courses on campus, K-State offers evening and Saturday classes at Fort Riley. The classes on post run for eight weeks and are offered five times a year.

Because the courses do not last a full semester, each class period is longer. Students learn the same information and receive the same number of credit hours as students taking the courses on campus.

"It's not something that, because it's done in a shorter amount of time, it's necessarily easier," Canelos said. "In fact, for some courses it's tougher."

Spec. Cheryl Jaworski said it was difficult to attend the intense, eight-week classes, study, serve in the Army, and take care of a family.

Jaworski, who has taken evening K-State classes at Fort Riley, has accumulated 30 college credits in the past five years.

When she took classes on the K-State campus for one semester in 1986, she said she found it was easier to learn the material when it is spread out in a 16-week format.

Canelos said classes are offered on eight-week schedules so soldiers who have to leave Fort Riley for military reasons, such as special training at other posts, are able to sit out a session instead of missing out on the course work.

"For most soldiers we need to stay with the eight-week schedule, so we offer more opportunities for them to go," Canelos said.

Sgt. Christopher O'Brien, who has taken eight-week classes at Fort Riley, has accumulated 57 credits — three short of an associate degree. O'Brien said he plans to earn a bachelor's and a master's.

"I believe that in order to be better situated both economically and intellectually in today's world, we must be willing to broaden our horizons," he said. "If you don't expand your horizons, you're going to find that the sun has set on you."

The second way soldiers can earn college credit is through College Level Examination Program tests. If students score high enough on the tests, they can earn college credit without taking the class, Kindsvatter said.

"The thing is, they're recommended college credit," she said. "Every university makes the decision whether they're going to grant credit for that particular test. So there are some that K-State will grant credit for and some they will not."

CLEP tests are offered at Fort Riley free of charge. Books, video tapes and other study materials are available to help soldiers prepare for the tests.

Soldiers can also earn college credit through independent study programs, such as the Defense Activity for Non-Traditional Education Support system. DANTES is a comprehensive catalog that lists college courses available for independent study from major universities across the country.

"This works out real well with some of the soldiers who, because they train so much, cannot attend classes at night," Kindsvatter said.

Although the University of Kansas is the base school for independent study in Kansas, soldiers can take classes from any university in the catalog.

But earning college credit is not the only way Fort Riley soldiers can advance their education. Soldiers are offered the opportunity to advance in their military training through Troop School programs at Fort Riley. Canelos said Troop School classes teach specialized Army skills, such as maintenance and repair of tanks.

Fort Riley also offers soldiers free use of Job Skills Education Program laboratories. JSEP is a computer system that allows soldiers to independently study military skills and basic educational skills.

"They can come here and do individualized study to increase their proficiency and their intellect," Kindsvatter said. "They can also use this as a way to improve in math and reading proficiency to enable them to take higher education later on."

O'Brien said the educational program at Fort Riley has opened up new opportunities for many soldiers.

Miami ordinance draws criticism

By The Associated Press

MIAMI — A proposed ordinance allowing police to jail anyone found sleeping on the street was criticized Tuesday as a ploy to remove the homeless just in time for the city arena's professional basketball debut.

The new downtown Miami Arena holds its first regular-season National Basketball Association game Saturday with the new team called the Miami Heat.

The arena is a few blocks from the only shelter for the homeless in the city, Camillus House. Because Camillus House cannot hold all the city's homeless, many of those who go there wind up sleeping on the sidewalks outside the building.

The proposed ban on sleeping, cooking, bathing or urinating on city property is slated to go before the City Council on Thursday for quick action as an "emergency ordinance." The penalty for violations is a 10-day jail term or a $100 fine.

Because the proposal is classified as an emergency ordinance, a public hearing is not slated before the council votes. City officials denied the contention by critics that the hurried consideration of the proposal was related to the upcoming basketball game.

"This could potentially make Miami look terribly bad," said Camillus House director Brother Paul, a Roman Catholic brother. "I mean, we look bad enough already because we're the only city in the nation of this size that doesn't provide anything."

A 44% Increase In Retirement Benefits Just For Legislators and Ivan Sand Voted For It.

No matter which way he may try to get out of it, the fact remains Ivan Sand voted for a 44% increase in all legislator's retirement benefits. This means some legislators at age 65 will get $30,000 a year for life.
"They" say they did it because it gave other state employees a 3% raise for their benefits. Whos kidding whom?

WINES

'THE DELIGHTFUL POISON'

Legend has it that wine was discovered by a neglected member of a Persian king's harem who tried to end her loneliness by drinking from a jar marked 'POISON.' The jar contained fermenting grapes.

The young woman felt so much better after she drank the liquid that she gave a cup of it to the king. He named it "the delightful poison" and welcomed her back into his harem.

For 8,000 to 10,000 years, wine has been produced through a process known as fermentation. Although wine can be produced by the fermenting of any fruit, most wines are made from grapes grown in Europe or the United States.

"White wine can be made from red or white grapes," said Charles Partlow, assistant professor in hotel and restaurant management. "To get white wine, the skin is taken off the grapes before fermentation and for red wines the skin is left on during fermentation."

The aging process allows the wine to mellow and develop its special character, Partlow said. Taste determines when a wine is ready to be bottled, for the wine must have lost its acidity.

"Red wines are better suited for aging," Partlow said. "A good wine can be aged for 70 years or more."

Wines are categorized into three classes: table wines, sparkling wines and fortified wines.

Table wines are the most common dinner wines in restaurants and bars, Partlow said. Red wines, white wines and rose´ are the three most common table wines.

Traditionally, the accepted preference is to order red wine with red meat and white wine with white meat, he said. But today, people are ordering whichever they like best, Partlow said.

"The taboos about wine are being broken down because it has kept people from enjoying wine in the past," he said.

Red wines are nearly always dry, which means they lack sweetness. Dryness is one of the qualities that makes red wine a suitable accompaniment to a hearty meat course, such as steak or lasagna. The proper serving temperature for a red wine is at room temperature.

White wines vary from dry to very sweet, Partlow said. The drier whites have traditionally complemented fish entrees because of the delicate flavor. Sweet white wines are usually served with desserts.

When ordering white wine by the glass, usually before a meal, it is best to order a medium-dry white wine. Partlow said the whites are most often served chilled.

Rose´ wines vary from pale shades of pink to nearly red. The rose´ wines are light and fresh, with a fruity flavor. Like a white wine, a rose´ is served chilled. The rose´ wine is usually served at informal occasions such as luncheons and receptions.

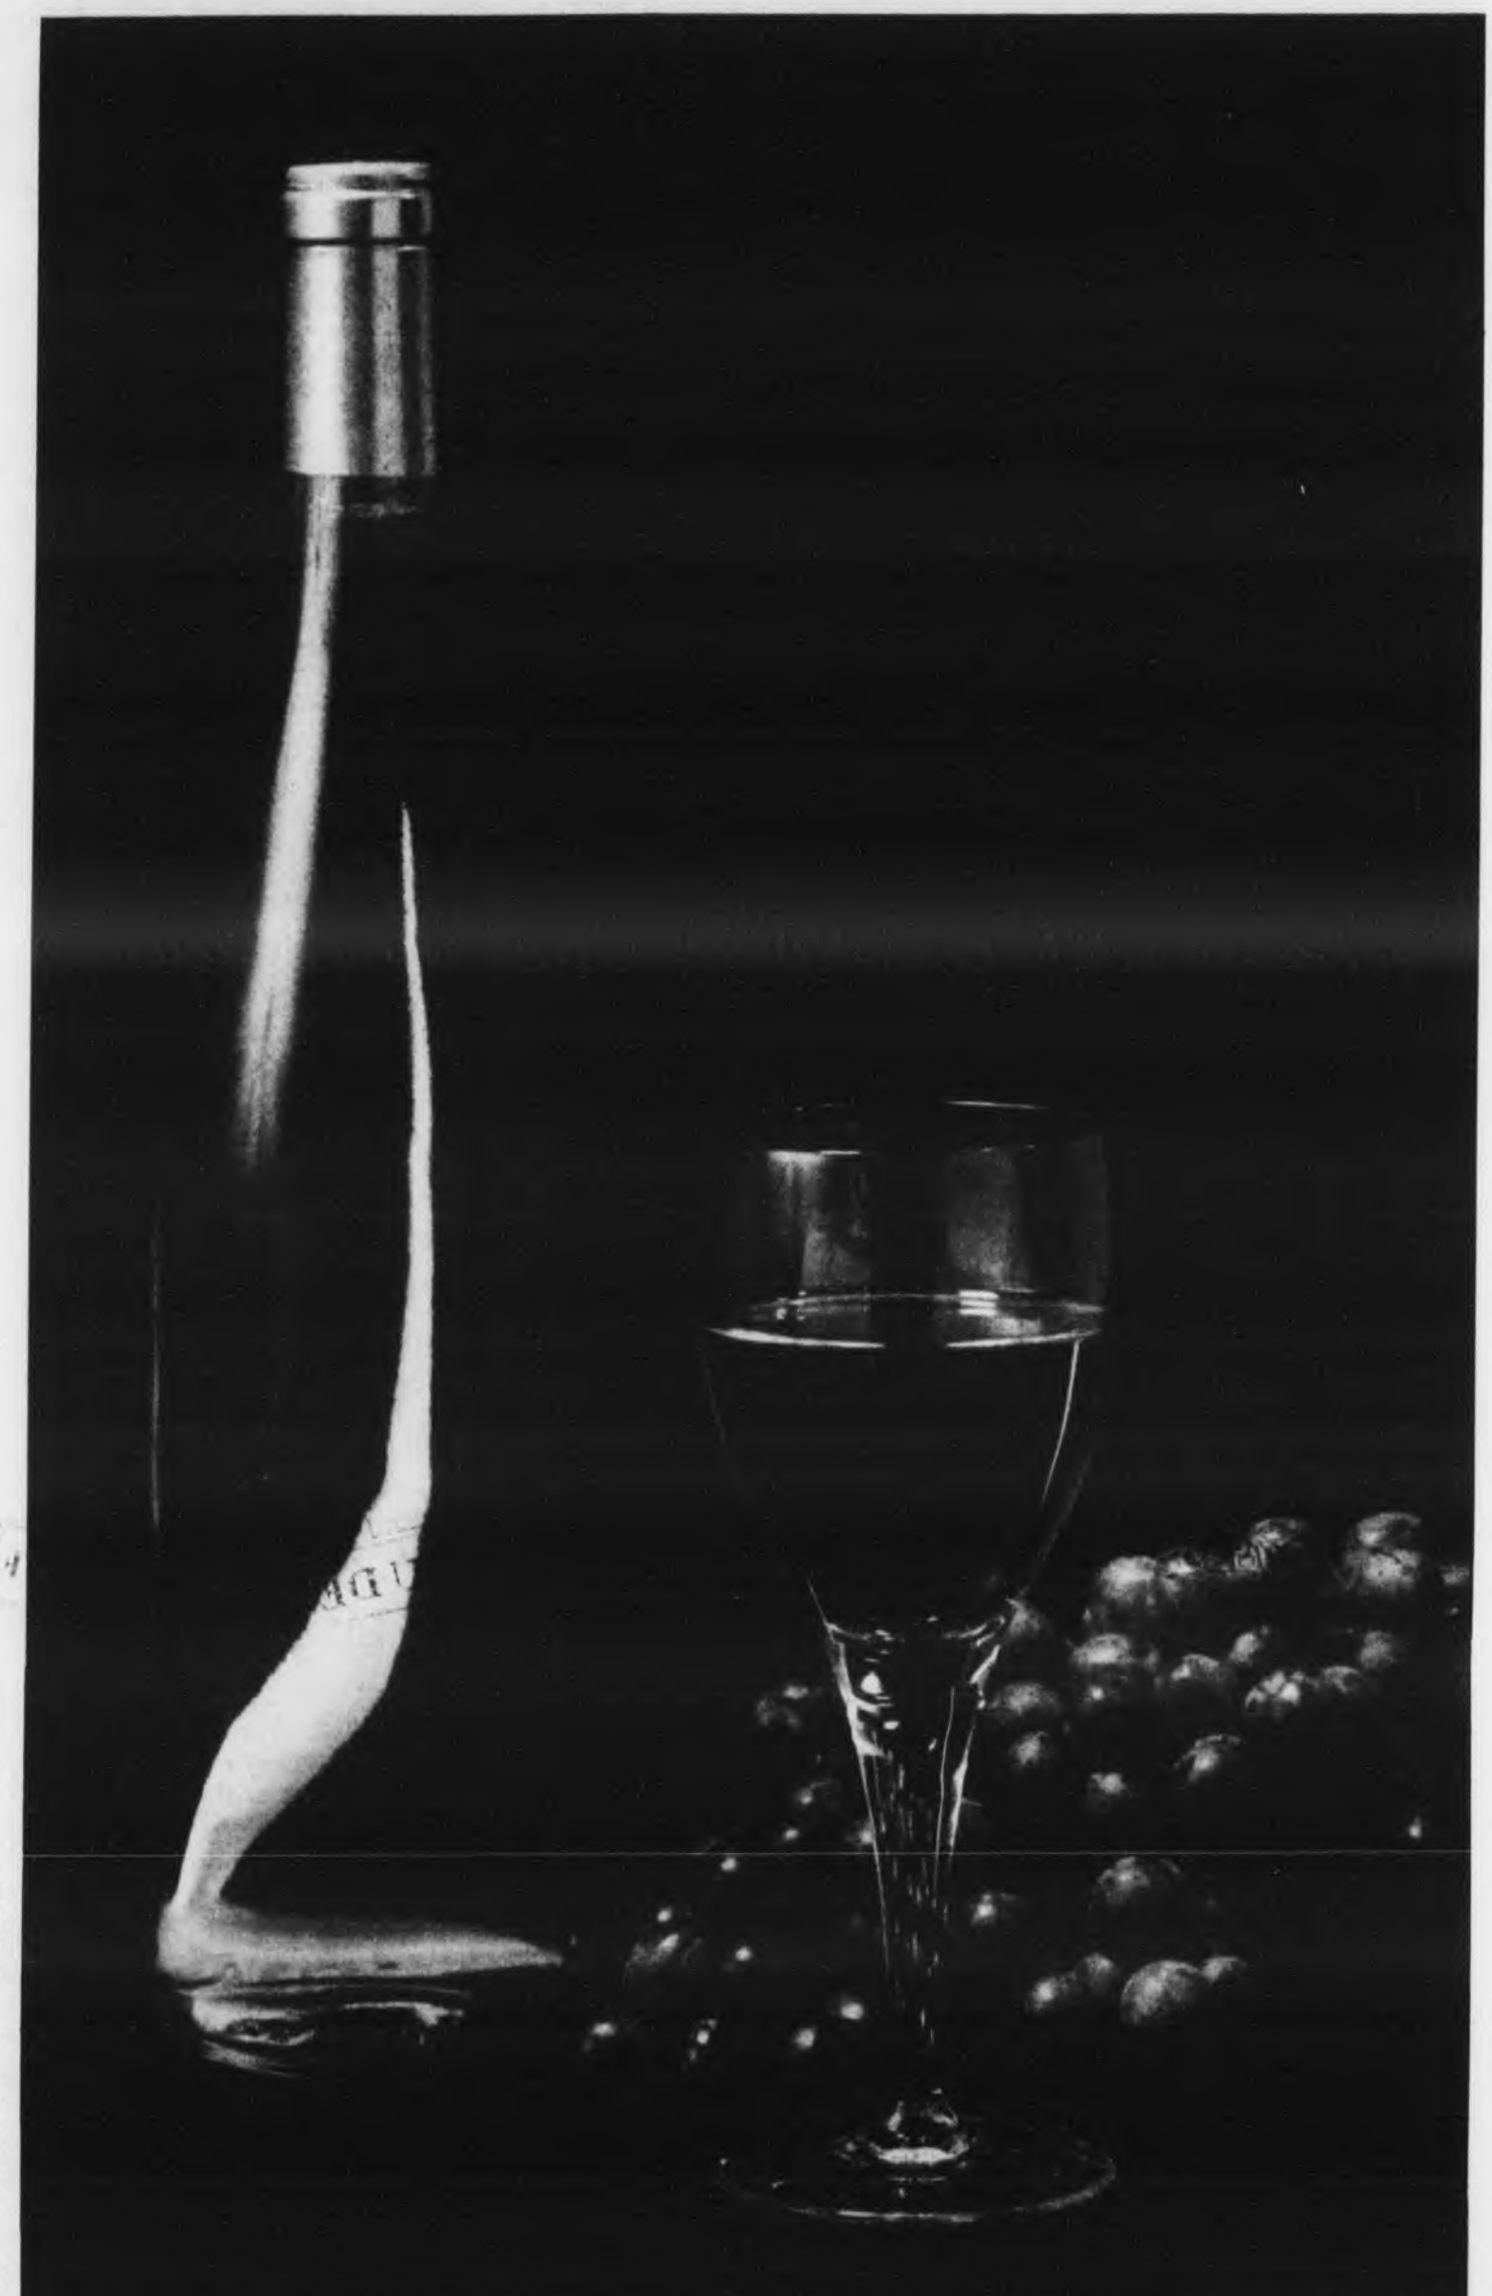
Sparkling wines are another type of wines that are often ordered in restaurants.

The unique characteristic of the sparkling wines is the bubbles due to carbonation. Champagne is the sparkling wine most Americans recognize. It is the classical wine of celebration and should be served chilled, Partlow said.

"It doesn't go well with meals but is often served with caviar or oysters on the half shell," Partlow said.

Most dessert wines are known as fortified wines. The percentage of alcohol in fortified wines is higher than in other wines. Usually it is between 18 and 19 percent, whereas other wines traditionally contain 12 to 15 percent, he said.

Dessert wines are usually sweet, rich and heavy which makes them appropriate for the end of a meal. The wines may be served either chilled or at room temperature. Restaurants serve dessert wines in small after-dinner glasses.



Varietal wines are named according to the type of grape used in the processing. The varietal wines are the most popular in the United States, and include wines such as Chardonnay and Zinfandel. Varietals range in price from moderate to high.

"White Zinfandel seems to be one of the most popular wines today because it's slightly sweet, very pretty and fits the tastes of Americans, especially the novice wine drinkers," Partlow said.

The cost of wine depends on the reputation of the producer and where it was produced, he said. The place of origin is usually a controlled area that produces quality wines. The area must meet strict government regulations that approve of the soil in which the grape vineyards grow, climate, quality of the grapes and production methods.

In the United States, the best grape growing areas are in California, New York and Washington. The most fussed-over wine in the world comes from the Bordeaux region in France, Partlow said. Bordeaux is the connoisseur's wine. Many inexperienced wine drinkers don't even like it, Partlow said.

A few of the qualities to look for in a fine wine are aroma, slight tartness, aftertaste and character. Wines vary in the degree of sweetness, softness, astringency and mellowness according to whether it is a dry wine or a sweet wine.

Thatcher's Poland trip brings diplomatic challenges

By The Associated Press

LONDON — Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, scourge of British labor and "Iron Lady" to Moscow, arrives today in Poland, where she is admired by its communist leaders and its banned Solidarity trade union movement.

Adding to this paradox and increasing the diplomatic challenge of the three-day official trip, the Polish government said Monday it will close the Lenin shipyard, birthplace of Solidarity, because it is unprofitable.

At a monument outside the shipyard at Gdansk on Friday, Thatcher is to lay a wreath with Solidarity leader Lech Walesa, an event the British insisted on as a pre-condition of the visit.

Her domestic opponents charged that expressions of sympathy to Walesa would sound hollow from the leader whose record includes eliminating thousands of jobs in the British coal and steel industries, and emasculating Britain's once-powerful labor unions.

Polish leader Gen. Wojciech Jaruzelski, in a British television interview soon after the closure announcement, heaped new praise on Thatcher for what he called her "hard-handed implementation of total economic efficiency."

"We feel admiration for Mrs. Thatcher for that reason, that she has pursued such a consistent and ... aggressive economic policy which has brought such results," Jaruzelski said.

"And I would very much like to ask for her counsel," the Polish Communist Party chief added, without apparent irony, of his imminent talks in Warsaw with the Conservative Party prime minister, Britain's most right-wing leader since World War II.

Thatcher's aides said she will argue to both sides that political and economic reform go together.

Said opposition Labor Party foreign affairs spokesman Gerald Kaufman: "Mrs. Thatcher's visit to Poland is an act of hypocrisy which the Poles will survive and forget."

Either way, most British analysts saw the shipyard closure announcement as giving the Thatcher visit more political overtones than she bargained for, including possible anti-government demonstrations when she is in Gdansk on Friday.

The Times of London said Polish Prime Minister Mieczyslaw F. Rakowski's choice of the shipyard as the first big enterprise to go under a program of economic reforms "will dull the moral and aspirations of people in Poland no less surely" than the 1981 declaration of martial law.

"He (Rakowski) signaled not only that the government would not allow Solidarity to interpret Thatcher's visit as their triumph, but also that Gdansk's days as a place of pilgrimage for Western leaders are numbered," the newspaper added in an editorial.

The Gdansk trip is the centerpiece of the non-official engagements in a schedule reflecting both modern East-West politics and memories of World War II, which was began in 1945 when Britain declared war on Germany after Adolf Hitler invaded Poland.

Beginning with an official welcome by Rakowski in Warsaw on Wednesday evening, Thatcher, 63, has a hectic schedule.

It includes talks with Cardinal Jozef Glemp, Poland's Roman Catholic leader; non-Solidarity government opponents or critics, including academics; wreath-laying ceremonies at the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier in Warsaw and at Westerplatte where German forces invaded.

Diet instructor helps save people's lives

By The Associated Press

NEWARK, N.J. — Ten tremendously obese people are dropping weight steadily since they gathered in June under the wing of comedian-turned-activist Dick Gregory to shed the hundreds of pounds that threatened their lives.

Ron Miller, 25, of Marion, Ind., can touch his toes, now that he has dropped 199 pounds from his 624-pound frame. And 15-year-old Jonita Mitchell of Biloxi, Miss., lost 98 pounds, down to 414 pounds; now she can walk for 45 straight minutes instead of stopping every few feet, as she did when she arrived.

Gregory, 57, brought 15 people in June to his health center, where dieters participate in a strict regimen that begins at 5:15 a.m. Five have since left due to family and economic problems, Gregory said, but he says the remaining five men and five women "give fat people a good name."

Their losses have meant adjustments — like clothing that is now too big.

"I always feel my underwear slipping now but I don't mind," Miller said.

Gregory announced Monday that his group has bought the 117-room Beachmark Inn in Fort Walton Beach, Fla., for $10 million and plans to move the program's participants there in the next few weeks.

The resort will allow him to provide better care for more people than he can at his center in Newark.

Mickey Steidl, 22, a 497-pound man who used to weigh 641 pounds, said his day in Medina, Ohio, began with a half-dozen eggs, bacon, sausage, biscuits. The day would be a "continuous meal" with lunch of three or four hero sandwiches plus a visit to McDonald's and then dinner with the family followed by a tour of the town's fast-food restaurants. A late night pizza might cap off the day.

Under his current schedule, the day begins with two glasses of water followed by a 45-minute walk, and then two more glasses of water followed by breakfast of half a grapefruit and half an orange.

There are personal and group activities until noon, when lunch is raw vegetables or fresh fruit. The afternoon is devoted to personal time punctuated by servings of Gregory's Bahamian diet drink, a multivitamin powder mixed with fruit juice. Dinner is a repeat of lunch.

Dieters say they lost their appetites within a month after starting the program, but still may suffer depression.

Nancy Gray, a 48-year-old mother of seven from Duxbury, Mass., remembers a weekly weigh-in on a scale with a capacity of up to 2,000 pounds.

Sales record possible

By Kevin Kramer
Collegian Reporter

The number of basketball season tickets sold for this season hit 10,600 as of 4 p.m. Tuesday, only 45 tickets short of the record season ticket sales of the 1977-78 season, said K-State Athletic Department Ticket Manager Carol Adolph.

"This will turn into a record-setting year for ticket sales at K-State," Adolph said. "This year's total will easily surpass the record on Wednesday.

"The 6,000 K-State student season tickets were sold out in just two days, she said. Last year, K-State sold a total of 8,500 season tickets.

The 1988-89 Wildcats also have the opportunity to break the single-season average attendance record at K-State, Adolph said. The largest average attendance ever attracted by the team was during the 1968-69 season, when the average attendance was 12,166 for 11 home games.

"I know that it's rewarding for Lon (Kruger, head men's basketball coach,) and his team to see the public respond to their success and the overall tradition of the program," said Steve Miller, athletic director.

"There are a lot of K-Staters who are hopeful that Bramlage Coliseum will be sold out on a season ticket basis in its first year of operation, and it appears that we're headed in that direction."

Student tickets for the K-State-Purdue basketball game will go on sale from 6 to 8 p.m., Thursday, in the Ahearn Field House ticket office, Adolph said.

Needham makes early impact

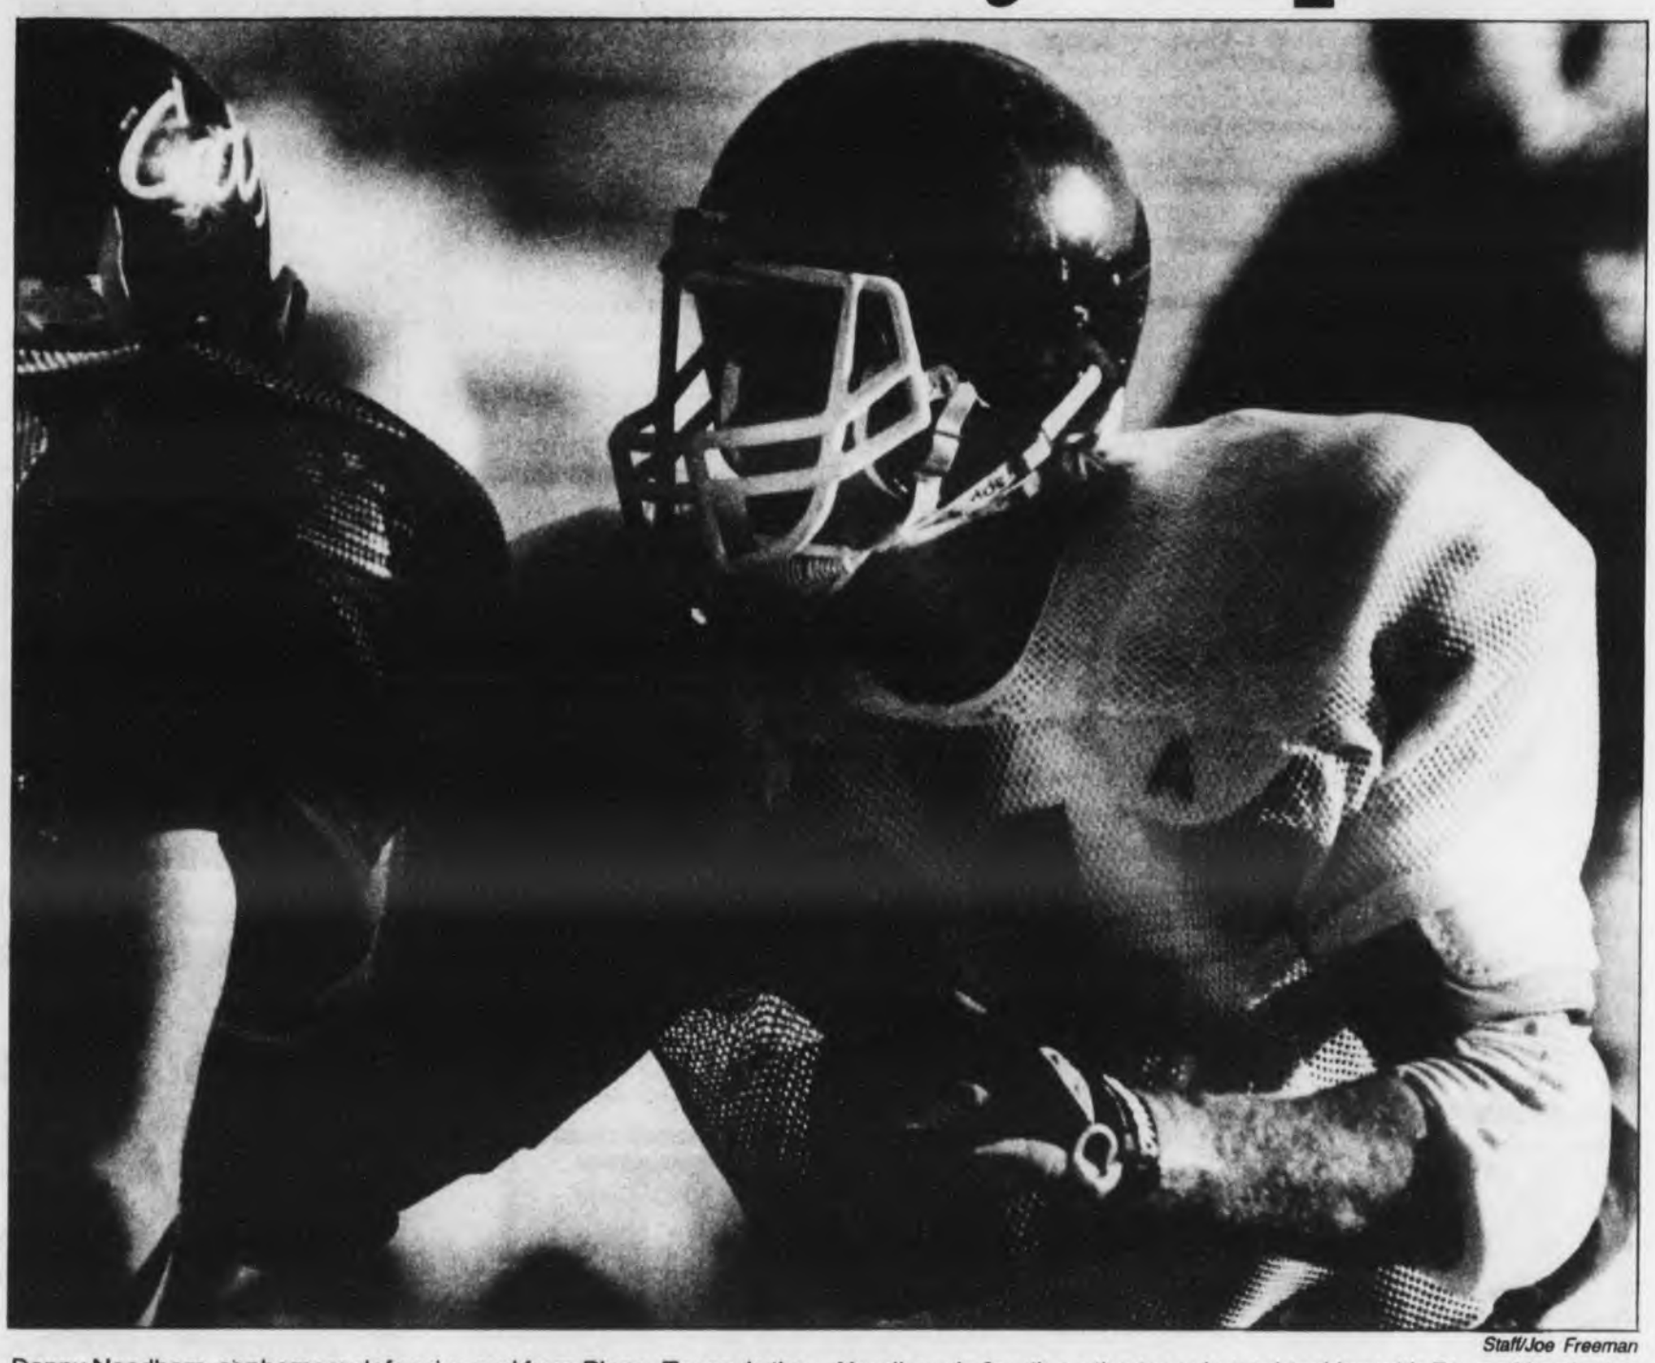
By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

Sophomores don't usually get to start on NCAA Division I-A football teams, much less become team leaders.

Most teams, however, aren't faced with the same dilemmas that face K-State, and most sophomores don't make as much impact as 'Cats defensive end Danny Needham has for his team.

"Danny has been a real pleasant surprise on our defense," said head coach Stan Parrish. "He has made some big plays for us this season and he is just a sophomore. I think he will be a real asset for K-State in the future."

Needham, who hails from Plano, Texas, is fourth on the team in total tackles with 51, and leads the team in interceptions with three. In his most recent outing, against Oklahoma State, Needham tied linebacker Maurice Henry for total tackles with 11. He also leads all Wildcat defensive ends and linemen in tackles.



Needham came to K-State because he knew he would have the opportunity to play. But he didn't realize how much action he'd see, or how soon he'd see it.

"I came up here with the intention that I would play as a sophomore. I didn't expect to play as a true freshman," Needham said. "I kind of wanted to be redshirted. I was redshirted up until the Oklahoma State game last year, which I started. I really intended to take a redshirt year so that I could catch up to some of the other guys in size and strength, but it didn't work out like that.

"I'm sure when tight ends see our game films, they get a smile on their face when they see they get to go against someone as small as I am. That's a given."

Although Needham thinks he has plenty of room for improvement, his teammates have given him a vote of confidence.

"I would have to say that Danny Needham is the leader of our defense," Henry said. "Not because he is the biggest or the strongest player, but because he makes the big plays and he doesn't make a lot of mistakes at his position.

Staff/Joe Freeman

Danny Needham, sophomore defensive end from Plano, Texas, is the defensive team leader because of his ability to make the big plays. Needham is fourth on the team in total tackles with 51, and leads the team in interceptions with three.

"Some of the things he does, and the plays he creates, fire up this team at just the right time."

Needham, while surprised at some of his statistics on the season, thinks he has more to contribute.

"Personally , I wish I would have done a little bit better this season than I have," he said. "My goals from this summer obviously weren't accomplished. I didn't gain the 10 pounds that I wanted to, and I really think that has hurt me a lot as far as my position goes.

"I play against guys that weigh 50 and 60 pounds more than I do, and as a result, sometimes I get knocked off the ball. It's not really too bad, but it's a lot worse than it would be if I was 10 or 15 pounds heavier."

Coping with a losing stigma has been a new feeling for Needham.

"Coming to K-State has been a big change for me," said Needham. "I came from a high school team that went 14-2 (his final two years). I'm more than half way through my second season at K-State and we haven't won one yet.

"It's been quite a shock so far. I don't even know what it is like to win one here, but I'd sure like to find out against KU, and I think we will. (Nov. 5) is my birthday and I'd like to come back here after the game and see everyone go crazy."

University needs a 'winner' for new football coach

Mid-Week Commentary

TOM PERRIN
Sports Columnist

The ideal profile for a new K-State head football coach.

In around a month, athletic director Steve Miller will announce the hiring of a man whom he believes will come close to fitting that description.

Just how that profile should read is a matter of opinion. And, well, that's what they pay me well into the six-figure range to do here at the Collegian — give my opinion.

First of all, the two most important characteristics of an ideal K-State coaching candidate are many times in direct conflict with one another. For openers, a candidate should come from a winning background. Second, a candidate should have strong connections to K-State. This narrows things down quite a bit, because chances are that anyone who has spent much time at K-State has probably lost a lot.

Even though finding a suitable person who fits both descriptions may be difficult, the effort should still be made as both qualities are very important. The reasons K-State needs a "winner" to take over as coach are obvious. After all, winning is the object of the game and a winning team brings in a lot more money than one that wins a game about every other year.

The reasons K-State needs to go after a K-Stater, or at least someone who knows K-State, are a bit less obvious but no less important. Without knowledge of how monumental a task it will be to take charge of the Wildcat football program, a coach can't possibly do the job right. Stan Parrish admits now that he didn't know just how tough the job would be. Parrish's resignation shows the result to which this lack of understanding can lead.

The reality of the situation is that K-State has the all-time record for losses in NCAA's Division I-A and is one of the two or three most difficult football coaching jobs in the United States. Turning this team around will take patience and time and a coach must realize this or be doomed to failure.

Whether these people would accept the K-State job if offered is unknown, but here are some possible candidates that actually fit the brief, but by no means complete description I gave for the ideal candidate.

Top among them is Bob Stull, the current head coach at University of Texas at El Paso. Stull is a former K-State player (1965, '66 and '67) and assistant coach. But still more significant, Stull has taken a program that was every bit as down at K-State's is now and raised it to respectability.

It hasn't been too many years since the Bottom Ten syndicated newspaper column had "Texas at El intercepted Paso" atop its rankings of college football's worst teams. For the last two years, the Miners have contended for Western Athletic Conference titles. This year, a bowl game isn't completely out of the question. If Stull could do that at K-State, he would be just about the most popular man in Kansas.

Another possibility is Ron Dickerson, an assistant coach at Penn State who lettered at K-State in 1968, '69 and '70. Dickerson wouldn't appear to be quite as good a candidate as Stull, but he does have his strengths. Dickerson has also been an assistant at Louisville, Pittsburgh and Colorado and has a reputation as a good recruiter.

The other possibility, New England Pat-

Sabo named NL's top rookie

NEW YORK — Third baseman Chris Sabo, who batted .271, hit 11 homers and drove in 44 runs for the Cincinnati Reds, was named the Jackie Robinson National League Rookie of the Year Tuesday by the Baseball Writers Association of America.

Sabo received 79 points and 11 first-place votes from a panel of 24 writers, two from each NL city. First baseman Mark Grace of the Chicago Cubs was second with 61 points and right-hander Tim Belcher of the Los Angeles Dodgers was third with 35.

Free agency total hits 51

NEW YORK — Pitchers Fernando Valenzuela and Jay Howell, both eligible for free agency, have agreed to new contracts with the Los Angeles Dodgers, while pitcher Ron Davis of San Francisco filed for free agency, the players union said Tuesday.

Davis' filing raised the total to 51.

Montana confused over role

SANTA CLARA, Calif. — Stopping just short of a "play-me-or-trade-me" demand, a confused Joe Montana says he won't settle for the role of No. 2 quarterback with the San Francisco 49ers.

The 49ers' season-long quarterback controversy, which has virtually overshadowed the team's bid for a sixth straight playoff berth, flared anew in the wake of Walsh's comments that Montana won't be sufficiently recovered from various ailments to start Sunday at Phoenix.

Montana said he already is and contends he is in as good shape as he was when he led the 49ers to their first Super Bowl title in 1981.

Probation shocks Kansas students

The University of Kansas basketball team will not repeat as national champions in 1988-89 because of the penalties handed the program Tuesday by the NCAA.

Although KU was the team that eliminated K-State from the NCAA tournament last year, gloating is the last thing on the mind of Steve Miller, K-State's athletic director.

"Anytime any penalties are handed down, you have a certain degree of empathy for the student athletes in the program and the people that are there now," Miller said. "But at the same time, you have a certain sense of justification — meaning they didn't get where they were by luck.

"Right now my biggest concern is the impact that this will have on the conference. If (KU) ends up being a great team and it can't compete in the NCAA tournament, you have to look at how it will affect the Big Eight, especially in a revenue sense."

Tim Allen, service bureau director at the Big Eight office, said KU's participation in the Big Eight tournament is uncertain.

"The NCAA penalties do not keep KU out of the tournament," Allen said.

However, it is possible for KU to be disallowed from participating in the tournament.

"If KU were to be left out of the tournament, that would be determined by the schools' directors of athletics at one of the quarterly meetings," Allen said.

The next meeting is in December.

The reaction of students and supporters at KU was mostly of surprise at the severity of the penalties, which besides the NCAA tournament sanctions also include the loss of one scholarship and the barring of paid recruiting visits in 1989.

"The general feeling around campus was that nothing big was going to come of the investigation, so this is pretty shocking," said Britt York, senior in economics.

"I've only spoken with one administrator and a few students, but everyone thought it was a little harsh," said Brook Menees, student body president.

"It's disappointing because it would have been interesting to see if the 'Hawks could have made it to the tournament," Menees said. "Now we can only speculate.

"If you make mistakes though, you have to live with them. I just hope that Coach Williams will remain optimistic and still try to have a good recruiting year. Besides, this will be a rebuilding year, and I hope we can look beyond it."

Jerry Cotton, a KU season ticket holder for 18 years, said, "I think it was kind of stiff. It's really going to be hard on the program. I think the effects will last for six or seven years."

Brown disappointed by NCAA's penalties

By The Associated Press

SAN ANTONIO — Former Kansas basketball coach Larry Brown, who gave a student-athlete $364 for a plane ticket to see his dying grandmother, said Tuesday he was disappointed by the NCAA sanctions imposed on the university's basketball program and never would have left Kansas if he felt the penalties would be so strong.

Brown, who led the Jayhawks to the NCAA championship last spring, accepted in June a $3.5 million, five-year contract to coach the NBA's San Antonio Spurs.

Kansas on Tuesday was put on a three-year probation for recruiting violations and will not be allowed to defend its title. It will be barred from postseason play in the first year of the probation. It also will not be allowed to give paid campus recruiting visits in 1989 and will be stripped of one scholarship during that period.

"I am sorry that the present players and staff must suffer the consequences of these penalties and had I known the extent of the penalties at the time, I would not have left the University of Kansas to bear these penalties alone," Brown said at a news conference.

Brown, who brought his three assistants with him to San Antonio, said they repeatedly have been bashed by the Kansas administration that did not appreciate them delivering a winning program.

"The bottom line is we know what expense (the NCAA) went to and how much time they (spent trying) to figure out the things that we were doing and to see if there was any pattern and they couldn't find anything," Brown said.

Economic growth forecast shows third decline in past 5 months

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The government said Tuesday that its chief economic forecasting gauge dipped 0.1 percent in September, the third decline in the past five months.

Private economists said the Commerce Department's Index of Leading Indicators was signaling slower growth but probably no recession next year.

The 0.1 percent September decline followed drops of 0.7 percent in both May and July. Often, three consecutive monthly declines have been the signal of an impending recession.

But the latest declines have been interspersed with large monthly gains, including a revised 0.5 percent increase in August and a sizable 1.5 percent advance in June, the biggest gain since late 1986.

After smoothing out the big month-to-month swings, analysts said the leading index was indicating a slowing of the robust economic growth of the past year.

"There is absolutely no question that the economy is slowing down," said Lawrence Chimerine, chief economist of the WEFA Group, an economic consulting firm. "The only question is whether this slowdown will lead into a recession."

Chimerine said he believed a recession can be avoided over the next 12 months to 18 months, although he said this forecast could prove too optimistic if consumer spending slows more than expected or if the dollar comes under further sharp pressure from foreigners worried about the ability of the next administration to deal with budget and trade deficits.

If foreigners suddenly decide they no longer want to buy U.S. debt, that would force U.S. interest rates higher and could push the country into a downturn, he said.

The recovery from the 1981-82 recession completes a peacetime record of six years this month and the Reagan administration is hoping this performance will persuade voters to keep the White House in Republican hands.

While many economists once believed that the new president would face a recession in his first year in office, most are now predicting the downturn will not occur until 1990 at the earliest.

The overall economy, as measured by the gross national product, is expected to expand at a robust 3.8 percent annual rate for all of 1988, the fastest pace since the last presidential election in 1984.

However, David Wyss, an economist with Data Resources Inc., predicted that growth next year would dip to around 2.3 percent. He said that forecast was in line with the signals from the leading index.

Many analysts believe that a boom in U.S. exports, which has accounted for fully half of the growth this year, and business investment spending, another key sector, will both level off in 1989.

In a second report Tuesday, the Commerce Department said construction spending rose 0.6 percent in September to an annual rate of $403.4 billion as strength in housing and government construction offset a decline in office building.

Construction spending for the first nine months of the year is just 0.7 percent higher than a year ago, a sluggish performance which analysts expect will continue.

Denver fights pollution

By The Associated Press

DENVER — The governor took the bus to work and the mayor greeted commuters at a bus station Tuesday as Denver launched its fifth Better Air Campaign to combat carbon monoxide pollution produced by cars and wood stoves.

Last year the campaign included for the first time an oxygenated fuels program for vehicles, and Denver dropped from first to seventh place on the Environmental Protection Agency's list of worst cities for carbon monoxide pollution. This year, the goals have been raised.

Carbon monoxide levels in the mile-high city are highest during the winter, when cold air traps the pollution. And internal combustion engines work less efficiently in the high, thin air and emit dirtier exhaust.

The Better Air Campaign encourages commuters in the six-county metro area to leave their cars at home at least one day a week and on high-pollution days until the end of January.

It also calls for wood-burning bans on high-pollution days; some communities have mandatory bans and others appeal for voluntary cutbacks.

The Air Pollution Control Division of the state health department announces high-pollution days, and expects about 20 of them in the three-month period of the Better Air Campaign.

Under the mandated high-oxygen fuels program, service stations along the Front Range will sell only cleaner-burning fuels blended with grain alcohol or a compound called MTBE, based on ether, until the end of February.

This year the Better Air Campaign hopes to reduce traffic by 10 percent and wood-burning by 8 percent on high-pollution days. Last year, it surpassed its goals by reducing traffic 9 percent — or 3 million miles a day — and wood-burning 7 percent.

The oxy-fuels program last year cut carbon monoxide emissions up to 9.5 percent, and this year's goal is 12 percent.

This film is being brought in conjunction with the Sydney Symphony performance at McCain Auditorium in celebration of Australia's bicentennial.
This Nicolas Roeg film details the rites of passage with a rare purity of vision. Two European children abandoned in the Australian outback are found by a young Aborigine boy. It is a magical time as the three enjoy life in an unspoiled, primitive world until civilization intrudes. Based on the novel by James Vance Marshall.

Israeli right-wing bloc favored to gain control, poll indicates

By The Associated Press

JERUSALEM — An exit poll Tuesday night indicated the right-wing Likud bloc has the best chance of gaining control after an election fought on the issues of rebellion in the occupied lands and peace with the Arabs.

For the deeply divided nation of 4.4 million, whose 40-year history is a calendar of war and violence, Tuesday's election was a crossroad in the future of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, which Israel captured from Jordan and Egypt 21 years ago.

Israel television said its poll was based on interviews with about 20,000 voters at 46 polling stations.

It said results indicated Likud, led by Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir, and the center-left Labor Party of Foreign Minister Shimon Peres would win 40 seats each, but Likud would have the edge in forming a coalition with small religious and nationalist parties.

In seats, the TV poll predicted the right would have 62 of the 120 in the Knesset, or parliament, and the left would get 58. The interviews were conducted two hours before the polls closed at 10 p.m. (3 p.m. EST).

Independent pollster Hanoch Smith also said the exit poll showed Shamir "definitely in a better position."

Finance Minister Moshe Nissim proclaimed at Likud headquarters in Tel Aviv: "Yitzhak Shamir will form the next government." If the exit poll "reflects the reality, it's clear that Labor has no coalition to block the Likud," Nissim said.

Throngs of Israelis voted in an atmosphere of violence created by the 11-month-old Palestinian rebellion coupled with a sudden outburst of attacks on Jewish civilians.

Politicians from both left and right said the attacks on civilians in recent days would help Likud, which wants to keep the occupied lands, and hurt Labor.

About 80 percent of the 2.9 million eligible voters turned out, reflecting the galvanizing effect of the rebellion, which has cost the lives of 10 Israelis and more than 300 Palestinians since it began Dec. 8, 1987.

A huge force of 13,000 police and other security personnel protected the 4,800 voting stations. The army sealed off the occupied territories, where the 1.5 million Palestinian residents conducted a general strike.

No significant results were expected until Wednesday and a vote as close as predicted could mean a wait of days, at least, to learn whether either major party could form a coalition.

Likud and Labor have spent four years in a tenuous "national unity" coalition because neither could make an alliance with minor parties after the indecisive 1984 election.

State group OKs proposals

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The state would scrap its system of prosecuting criminals through county attorneys and would change the way it provides legal services to indigent defendants under two recommendations endorsed Tuesday by a legislative committee.

The Special Committee on Judiciary agreed to forward proposals for a statewide district attorney system and modifications in the public defender system to the 1989 Legislature, which convenes Jan. 9.

Both proposals are designed to improve services that have been criticized recently. The committee spent the summer and fall studying issues related to the state's judical system.

Under the first proposal, each of the state's 31 judicial districts would have a single district attorney, elected every four years. The state would pay for only the district attorneys' salaries, with the rest of the costs for running their offices paid for by the counties.

"All along, I have envisioned that each county would either have an assistant district attorney, which would be a full-time job, or a deputy district attorney, which would be a part-time job," said Sen. Robert Frey, R-Liberal, chairman of the committee.

Currently, Kansas has a mixed system for providing for the prosecution of criminals.

In the early 1970s, the Legislature created district attorneys' offices in the state's five most populous counties — Sedgwick, Johnson, Shawnee, Wyandotte and Douglas. In each case, the county comprises an entire judicial district.

The rest of the state's 100 counties are divided into 26 other judicial districts, and each county has its own county attorney.

Social work field widens

By Heather Huntington
Collegian Reporter

A conflict has emerged between the increasing number of jobs in the social work profession and the lack of social work majors to meet that increase.

"The number of jobs is clearly expanding, and there are a variety of roles," said Marvin Kaiser, acting associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

The role of social workers has increased, especially in areas which deal with the elderly and child protection, Kaiser said.

A recent report stated there were 107 open positions for licensed social workers in Kansas within the state's department of Social and Rehabilitation Services, he said.

The state-wide KANWORK program, designed to train welfare recipients to become certified in the area of child care, has also created jobs for social workers, Kaiser said.

Increased awareness of abuse cases has been another cause for the need of social workers.

When people report cases of child abuse, someone has to investigate the report. Generally, social workers employed by Social and Rehabilitation Services investigate, he said.

Ironically, these are the very jobs that social workers seem to avoid.

"If we don't follow up on a report, then we put children in danger. Yet, we hate to invade the sacredness of the family," Kaiser said.

The growing divorce rate, concern for the AIDS virus and difficulty in handling stress have contributed to the need for more social workers, said Susan Davis, director of support services at the Manhattan Home Health Services.

The lack of social workers can have unpleasant results.

"People have needs that aren't getting met," Kaiser said. "Those in the profession are also feeling a lot of pressure to do quality work. It's difficult to do quality work with fewer people."

Although the need for social workers is on the rise, the profession's pay scale hasn't seen much of a change.

Social workers who begin employment at a nursing home can expect to receive a yearly salary of $10,000 to $12,000. Employees in state-funded jobs may earn as much as $16,000 to $17,000 in their yearly paychecks, Kaiser said.

"The most I would probably make is $18,000, but I don't think most people are in this major for the money," said Joanna Morgan, sophomore in family life and human development.

"I'm in (social work) because I want to make a difference in someone's life, and with this major I feel like I can," she said.

Students majoring in social work are required to complete 50 hours of volunteer work for the Introduction to Social Work class, Morgan said.

Volunteer work is done to ensure that students majoring in social work really want to pursue the profession, Kaiser said.

"It's easy to be a person who wants to do good, but it's different when you are directly involved," he said.

Morgan said she has enjoyed her volunteer work.

"I love working with people. (The work) has made me want to keep volunteering," she said.

Expansion in Mediterranean could ruin coastline by 2025

By The Associated Press

ATHENS, Greece — The Mediterranean coastline could be ruined by the year 2025 because of a population explosion, a tourism boom and industrial growth, according to a U.N. study released Tuesday.

The environmental study of 18 Mediterranean countries calls on nations surrounding the sea to cooperate in controlling their rapid development.

"Our starting point was the worst-case scenario and we are now looking at that scenario," said Michel Batisse, president of the U.N. Environment Program Blue Plan project.

According to the study, rapid population growth could ruin the 25,000 miles of Mediterranean coastline in less than four decades.

The number of people living around the Mediterranean will rise from about 360 million to more than 520 million by 2025, with the sharpest increase in coastal cities and around the southern shoreline, including Egypt, Turkey, Libya and Morocco.

The report warns that planning is needed to slow the growth of coastal cities.

The study also blames burgeoning tourism for the deterioration of the coast. With 100 million visitors in 1985, the Mediterranean basin attracts around one-third of all international tourist traffic and is the world's favorite destination.

By 2025, as many as 760 million tourists could be packing the Mediterranean shore, placing severe pressure on food, water and waste disposal resources, the study says.

The study urges governments to encourage off-season tourism to limit pollution and preserve natural attractions and archaeological sites.

Other dangers to the Mediterranean environment mentioned include destruction of forests, depletion of fresh-water supplies and dumping of untreated wastes into the sea.

"We haven't really discussed it yet but it seems like a positive step," Blodgett said.

John Keller, professor of regional and community planning and chair of the Faculty Senate committee on University planning, prepared a draft report on the new position which should be available later this week. He said the other members of the committee are currently looking at the draft and offering their suggestions.

The Purdue game, because it will be played during the University's Thanksgiving break, was not included in the student season tickets sold Oct. 14 and 15, she said. Other games not included on the student season ticket are the home games against Missouri-St.Louis on Dec. 22 and Texas-Arlington on Jan 5, both of which are during the University's Christmas break.

The single-game tickets for each of the holiday games will be sold on a first-come, first-serve basis, Adolph said. Purchases will be limited to 20 tickets per buyer, and the buyers must have a current semester fee card for each ticket purchased.

Tickets for the Purdue game are $5 each. For the UMSL and Texas-Arlington games, the price is $3. All seats will be reserved.

Season tickets are available to the public through the athletic ticket office. The price is $140 per ticket, which covers all 14 home games. Manhattan residents can call 532-6720. Outside Manhattan, the toll free number is 1-800-221-CATS.

riots quarterback Steve Grogan, is more remote. As far as big name in K-State history, Grogan couldn't be topped. Grogan, who is currently out of action with an injury, also calls all the offensive plays for the Patriots.

Although he's currently considering retirement, Grogan still may play another season or two. Even if he does retire, Grogan won't be available until Dec. 18 when the New England season ends. The other big problem is Grogan's lack of college coaching experience, particularly in recruiting.

So, here's the situation as it has developed to this point. Due to the unpredictable nature of coaching searches, it wouldn't be a complete surprise if none of the names mentioned here ever coaches a game at K-State.

From what I can see, the best situation would be to somehow lure Stull from UTEP to be head coach. Big money or whatever it takes. Just do it. Once named, Stull should hire Grogan as offensive coordinator.

Perhaps the newest technological advance is the interactive CD system which will combine sound, television and computer power, according to an article by Jeffery Zygmont in "High Technology Business."

Zygmont said that Philips New Media Systems and The Sony Corporation of America are pioneering the project, with several smaller companies joining.

The typical CD-I system will consist of a CD player wired to a television through a microprocessor. The microprocessor allows the user to interact with several programs.

A complete list of Northeast Kansas banks named among "America's Safest"

1. Union National Bank and Trust in Manhattan

A major financial magazine has listed Union National Bank and Trust in Manhattan among the 175 safest banks in the nation. The only Northeast Kansas bank to make the list! We were pleased, because when a group of financial analysts get together, they set some pretty stiff criteria.

It's nice to be recognized for being safe, because it's what we think banking is all about. To us, the very words, "safety" and "Union National Bank and Trust", are one and the same. After all, that's the way we've done business for nearly 100 years.

Even though it's your money, it's our reputation. After nearly a century of service we're not about to risk either one.

We're staying, Wefald says

From Staff and Wire Reports

President Jon Wefald said Wednesday he and his wife, Ruth Ann, plan to stay at K-State despite speculation he is a candidate for the position of president of the University of Minnesota.

"We're staying and we're not interested in going up there," he said.

Wefald has been mentioned as a possible successor to University of Minnesota President Ken Keller. Prior to becoming K-State president, Wefald was chancellor of the State University System of Minnesota, which includes all state universities except the University of Minnesota.

"... Ruth Ann and I talked about it and our feeling is that K-State is the place for us."

—Jon Wefald
University President

Wefald said he and his wife are happy here, believe the university is making significant progress, and are not interested in leaving.

"Ruth Ann and I discussed it, and decided that if you like it where you are, why think of something else," Wefald said. "We're staying."

A search committee recently narrowed its list of candidates for the presidency to 18. While names have not been released, Wefald has been frequently mentioned as a prospect.

"I'm sure the people in Minnesota nominated me for the position," Wefald said. "My name has been bandied about since Ken Keller stepped down. Because so many people have heard about the job, Ruth Ann and I talked about it and our feeling is that K-State is the place for us."

Wefald said the Minnesota search would probably be narrowed down to a few finalists in six to eight weeks. He said he has not contacted the search committee.

"No, I've just withdrawn," Wefald said.

The likelihood that the search in Minnesota would begin to intensify in the coming few weeks contributed to his decision to make an early statement of non-interest, Wefald added.

He listed a series of what he cited as positive steps being taken at K-State as factors that make him want to stay.

"We are in the midst of the Margin of Excellence program, in the midst of strategic planning, we have a new athletic director, enrollment is up, and we are getting ready to embark on the Essential Edge program," he said. "Beyond that, we like it here."

John McIntyre, student body president candidate, is sprayed with champagne by his supporters at his campaign manager's apartment. McIntyre received a phone call informing him of the election results. He made the runoff election, receiving a total of 826 votes.

Cuffy, McIntyre to runoff Nov. 9

By Becky Ives and Audra Dietz
Staff Writers

Hugs, high fives and cheers were abundant when John McIntyre, senior in industrial engineering, heard he was one of two candidates to make it to the runoff in the election for student body president.

McIntyre received the most votes, 826, while Laurian Cuffy, senior in management, pulled in 436 votes. According to the Student Governing Association, 2,543 students voted.

"A month and a half of work — it's finally paid off," Cuffy said after he was informed he will be in the Nov. 9 runoff election.

"I can't get over this, it's great!" he said.

"There is a long road ahead," McIntyre said. "I don't know what the numbers are yet, but voter turnout was not very high. Hopefully we can get more voter turnout for the runoff election.

"I'm at a loss for words right now, because I didn't know if I would make it or not," McIntyre said. "I'm kind of a happy camper right now."

McIntyre said he was surprised with the election results.

"I thought the race would be closer among all the candidates," he said.

"I don't try to say much, I just want the voters to get out and vote at the runoff," McIntyre said.

"John and I have been working on this a long time. I am so ecstatic, and so relieved," said Charlene Nichols, senior in journalism and mass communications.

"He's a leader, he is definitely the one," said Jim Gewecke, senior in marketing.

See related stories/ Pages 3 and 6

Cuffy said he was surprised, but he knew his campaign was effective.

"My vision is unity and growth. I want to unify this student body."

Cuffy also said K-State's student body has too many factions and this lack of unity hurts the University.

"We don't have any input from a unified force. We need to bring the non-traditional, off-campus, greek and minority students together," he said.

Mary Jo Lampe, senior in apparel and textile marketing and McIntyre's campaign manager, said nothing was going to change in this next week of campaigning.

"I think we have a long week ahead of us, but we can do it," Lampe said. "We are just going to keep on doing what we have been doing. We are going to get out and meet the people."

McIntyre's biggest concern was getting more students out to vote.

"We need to ensure that the people who voted will come out again, and then we need to get even more people out. Student body president at K-State is a very powerful position, and I just want to be sure the person who is elected is the one the Graduate School enrollment rises

By Brian Hummell
Staff Writer

Editor's note: This is the last of a three-part series on the Graduate School.

K-State's Graduate School enrollment increased this semester by more than 5 percent and a request made this summer to the Graduate School by President Jon Wefald indicates that increases are expected.

Wefald requested that the Graduate School become more involved in the recruiting of potential students into the program. In the past, recruiting was left to the individual departments, said F.L. Lee O'Neill, assistant to the dean of the Graduate School.

The 20th day of the semester enrollment figures showed 3,316 students enrolled in the Graduate School, an increase of 171. O'Neill said the increase was "pretty healthy."

The University of Kansas also experienced an increase in Graduate School students. KU's enrollment of 5,811 is an increase of 174 students over last semester.

Virginia Sayler, office specialist in the Graduate School, said recruitment to the Graduate School is left to the individual department. Almost every department had selective admissions, and the concentration of the programs was to attract quality students, she said.

Sayler said the Graduate School sponsors every fall and spring a recruiting meeting. Also, all students receive Graduate School information in the mail in the spring of their junior year and the fall of their senior year.

"The purpose is to recruit students to go to a Graduate School ... not necessarily at KU," Sayler said.

Leniel Harbers, assistant dean of the Graduate School, said the potential to continue increasing the number of graduate students at K-State is tremendous.

"In some departments, we could double the number of students," Harbers said. "We could double the enrollment of the Graduate School in five years. We're trying to plant the seed that life doesn't end at the baccalaureate degree.

"Some departments are hurting for Architecture officials desire enrollment cap

By Amy Lyons
Collegian Reporter

In an effort to control a deluge of incoming freshmen, the College of Architecture and Design has recommended a cap to limit the number of students accepted into the college. The proposal will be submitted to University administrators for approval later this week.

"We are actually making a K-State degree from the College of Architecture and Design more valuable," said Mark Lapping, dean of the College of Architecture and Design. "We are ensuring quality attention and the integrity of our product."

The college's faculty unanimously approved a cap recommendation in a meeting Monday. It probably will be implemented next fall, Lapping said.

"We've tried to look at it from all directions," Lapping said. "None of us like this. I happen to be one of those people who might not have gotten in straight out of high school and I've done reasonably well, but we just can't let everyone in. We don't have the room, the facilities or the faculty to accommodate the numbers."

Lapping said the current draft of the proposal stemmed from a request Provost James Coffman made last fall.

Coffman said although he has not seen the proposal, the problem must be addressed.

"The cap is a necessary step to stabilize a well-planned budgetary program like the College of Architecture and Design should run," Coffman said.

Although the tradition of a land-grant institution is that it welcomes all students, Coffman said the obligation to provide a quality education is greater than the obligation to sustain the land-grant tradition.

"We don't want to turn down students," Coffman said. "But, on the other hand, we have an obligation to give a quality education to all the students that are accepted."

In outlining the proposal, Lapping said high school performance would be assessed, including ACT scores and grade point averages. In addition, the college will formally suggest a high school class list for students.

Kansans will be given priority over non-residents, he said.

Leslie Buerk, senior in architecture and design and copresident of the K-State chapter of the American Institute of Architecture Students, said the cap is controversial, but a necessary evil.

"It's probably necessary because we have so many students that it's not as easy to get a good education as it could be," Buerk said. "I think the real problem is how to implement it.

"Students are afraid people will be turned down because of bad grades in high school. A lot of architecture students would have been affected by this."

Lapping said K-State is the last of the land-grant schools to fall prey to selective admissions.

"A number of people say we are denying our land grant heritage, but that is patently not the case," Lapping said. "We did a survey of our regents peers and we are the only ones without a cap. Our neighboring schools, the University of Kansas and University of Nebraska, have caps. I haven't found a land-grant school that is absolutely open enrollment."

At KU, a cap has been in place for almost 10 years, said Lois Clark, assistant dean of KU's College of Architecture and Urban Design. She said the cap has provided a better quality education for students.

"It goes very well for us here," she said. "We had gotten to the point where high school juniors were applying for admission, so we went to two review dates for applications. I think this process is the only way to manage these numbers and be fair to everyone."

Clark said KU has studio space for 144 students in each class. In 1988, KU turned away about 650 applicants.

K-State's College of Architecture and Design has a current enrollment of 1,040 students, up 700 from four

Union, Solidarity to cooperate

GDANSK, Poland — Lech Walesa told a rally of nearly all the 10,000 workers at the Lenin shipyard Wednesday that Solidarity and a government-backed union will cooperate for the first time to try to keep the shipyard open.

The government, meanwhile, announced a new approach to Walesa by Interior Minister Gen. Czeslaw Kiszczak to start delayed talks between authorities and the opposition on Poland's future.

Walesa, leader of the outlawed Solidarity union, announced the unprecedented cooperation with the rival official OPZZ trade union during the outdoor rally at the shipyard where Solidarity sprang up during nationwide strikes in August 1980.

The rally took place on the first workday since the government on Monday revealed its plans to close the yard Dec. 1, citing economic reasons. The move was denounced by activists as a deliberate blow by new Prime Minister Mieczyslaw F. Rakowski aimed at his longtime nemesis Solidarity, a charge Rakowski has denied.

Solidarity and the official trade union said in a joint resolution that, "The liquidation of the enterprise ... is a completely political decision because the financial position of the shipyard is advantageous at the present moment.

"One must not decide the future of the Gdansk shipyard without consulting the workcrew. We will defend our shipyard."

Survey shows mental health

WASHINGTON — Almost one in three Americans will suffer from a mental or substance abuse disorder sometime during life, and more than 15 percent experienced such a problem during a typical month, according to a federal mental health survey released Wednesday.

The survey, conducted in five cities by the National Institute of Mental Health, found that most mental disorders were most common among the younger age groups, and that men were more likely to have substance abuse and antisocial behavior problems than women.

Women, the survey showed, had higher rates for affective disorders, such as depression, anxiety, and disorders of somatization, or mental states that are reflected by physical symptoms.

Published in the November issue of the Archives of General Psychiatry, the survey involved interviews with more than 18,500 persons, aged 18 or older. The interviews were conducted in five cities: New Haven, Conn.; Baltimore; St. Louis; Durham, N.C., and Los Angeles.

Hijacking agreement signed

WASHINGTON — The United States and Canada issued a joint statement Wednesday pledging not to allow hijacked aircraft which have landed in their territory to take off again.

State Department spokesman Charles Redman said the United States already has a "no-takeoff policy" concerning hijackings but decided that a cooperative approach with Canada could serve as a deterrent to further hijackings.

The two countries agreed the policy would be in effect "except under extraordinary circumstances," Redman said.

They also agreed to take "all appropriate measures to restore control of the hijacked aircraft to its lawful commander and to detain the hijackers for the purpose of prosecution or extradition."

Fire continues on barge

SOLDOTNA, Alaska — The Coast Guard abandoned efforts Wednesday night to fight a fire on a barge loaded with thousands of gallons of diesel fuel and gasoline. Three people aboard were missing, but a fourth crewman escaped, authorities said.

Coast Guard said did not know if the fourth person aboard the 113-foot landing craft was hospitalized. The four were not identified.

The cause of the blaze was not known. The fire started at 8:45 a.m. near Trading Bay, 70 miles south of Anchorage. The vessel was about 100 yards off shore.

Coast Guard Lt. Matt Carr said interviews with boat's owners revealed that 20,000 gallons of gasoline were under the deck, "which has made us reevaluate the firefighting effort."

At 5 p.m., the barge was still burning, and the Coast Guard ordered its cutter to observe the fire from a safe distance.

The 197-ton vessel, called the Alaska Constructor and owned by Motor Vessel Construction Co. of Homer, was carrying a 36,000 gallons of diesel fuel and a tank truck containing 3,000 gallons of fuel, said Coast Guard Petty Officer Chris Haley.

Conference draws religions

WICHITA — Turbaned Sikhs, robed Franciscan monks and native costumed American Indians were among the representatives of a dozen major world religions who gathered in Wichita for a three-day conference to promote interfaith understanding.

Sponsored by the Nothern America Interfaith Network, the conference was called "A North American Assisi: A Multi-Religious Meeting." It was patterned after a November 1986 session at Assisi, Italy planned by Pope John Paul II.

More than 250 people representing the 12 major religions of North America gathered for the Wichita conference, which ended Tuesday night.

The relationship of the world and all living creatures emerged as one of the themes of the meeting.

Bishop Seigen H. Yamaoka of the Buddhist Churches of America said in an address he is concerned that the tendency of humans to discover, use, and discard will result in the end of the beauty and balance of natural interdependence.

"A shift will occur that will pull the flawed human, who is ignorant of the reality of what life truly is, into a state of pain and extinction," he said.

Diana Eck, professor of comparitive religion at Harvard, told conferees the way people in varied religious traditions respond to contemporary problems defines the great divisions between religious groups.

Methamphetamine seized

TOPEKA — Police seized chemicals and approximately three pounds of methamphetamine Wednesday night following a two-month undercover investigation, authorities said.

A man and a woman were arrested at Forbes Field in connection with the case, said Lt. K.C. Blodgett of the Topeka Police Department.

An undercover officer met with one of the suspects to buy chemicals to make the drug, Blodgett said. The officer then learned that another car at the airport contained more chemicals and the drug.

Police also seized a a small amount of marijuana, cash and drug paraphernalia, Blodgett said. The drugs and chemicals have an estimated street value of more than $144,000, he said.

Failed candidates to stay involved

By Paul Branson
Staff Writer

Nine student body presidential candidates received calls Wednesday night informing them they did not receive enough votes to participate in the runoff election Nov. 9.

J. D. Llewelyn, junior in business administration and a candidate who will not be in the runoff election, said even though he was not elected, he will stay in student government.

"I definitely plan to stay involved," Llewelyn said. "If you're in an election, you have to realize you may not win."

Llewelyn said he thinks all the issues raised during the election are important and deserve recognition. "I hope there aren't any issues that have trouble," he said.

Sally Howard-Clayton, senior in humanities who placed fourth in the voting, said her main priority now would be turning in her law school application.

"I'm going to stay involved in student government, but I'm going to put it off until next semester," Howard-Clayton said. "I'll be pretty busy for awhile."

"I think that since I'm not in the running, it'll be hard to get the political party system off the ground," Howard-Clayton said. "I know for instance that John McIntyre has said he thinks the political parties are the worst idea for getting rid of voter apathy and getting students to vote."

Howard-Clayton said her concern about the South African investment policy also needs consideration. "Laurian Cuffy has expressed some concern over our investment policy," she said. "I hope it comes to something."

Phil Kirk, senior in agriculture economic and who placed third in the voting, said the increasing student fees concerned him.

"This continual pushing up of student fees without asking the students might be a problem. We'll have to see," Kirk said.

Bob Copple, a graduate in industrial engineering who was not selected to participate in the runoff, said he is planning a little prayer and a cabinet meeting.

"I think the biggest thing the other candidates don't have is a sense of humor," Copple said. "I needed a Collegian endorsement."

Brenda Halinski, senior in elementary education who was not selected to participate in the election, said her biggest concern is equal representation.

"I really don't know how the two runoff candidates will handle this," she said.

Candidate Tom Jones, sophomore in political science who will not be on the runoff ballot, said he plans to stay involved in student government. "I'll really push for more equal representation of independents and other under-represented groups," he said.

Jones said he had some problems with the election process. "I had trouble with the expenditures.

"Last year Troy Lubbers spent $1,400 on his campaign. Most of that, around $800, was spent on T-shirts, which were exempt. I think something will have to done there," Jones said.

"I also think the Collegian didn't quote me fairly in its article on Monday," Jones said about Monday's article of the student body presidential debate. "I had more to say, and the only quote I got happened to be one of my worst," he said. "I'm really not sure that had anything to do with the election outcome."

Howard-Clayton said she would like to change the way the elections are conducted.

"The fee card thing has to go," she said. "Many students threw away their fee card as soon as they got it, and there's no reason that an automated system is not feasible. I think it was poor planning by Student Senate two years ago."

Credit procedures causing confusion

By Jenny Reschke
Collegian Reporter

Recent revisions in the procedure for gaining retroactive credit in modern languages are causing confusion among some language students this semester.

"They've (students) confused the placement test, which is administered on the second day of classes each semester, with a quiz out," said Brad Shaw, associate professor of modern languages.

"All the placement test does is place students in the class in which they belong," he said.

Some students, however, assumed that once in a particular level, they would automatically receive retroactive credit for the courses leading to that level.

Shaw explained why the changes have caused confusion.

"Under the old policy, if you placed in, for example, level III of a language, you would take the level III course and 3A (conversation), and, if you got a "C" grade or above, you would come in the departmental office, we'd fill out a form and you would receive ungraded credit for I and II," he said.

Now, to earn retroactive credit, students must take upper-level courses in addition to the course in which they placed.

Under the new policy, which became effective in August, students who place in level II courses, such as Spanish II or French II, will be given ungraded retroactive credit toward graduation for a level I course upon successful completion, with a grade of "C" or better, of the level II course.

Students, however, who are placed in level III courses, will receive retroactive credit for levels I and II upon successful completion of III and IV or an equivalent number of hours at III and one course above totaling seven hours.

Students who are placed in level IV courses will receive retroactive credit for I through III upon successful completion of IV and two courses above the IV level or nine equivalent course hours.

Students placing above level IV will receive retroactive credit for I through IV upon successful completion of four courses at the 500 level or above totaling 12 hours.

"We felt it needed revision. Different universities vary as much (in credit policy) as in other things like hour requirements," Shaw said. "Our (policy) is not overly liberal, but middle ground. It's fairly traditional, compared with other schools."

Clara Theissen, secretary in the department, said she sees few problems with the change.

Shaw hopes the change will have some long-term effects and will recognize students' skills.

Three associate deans named to college

By The Collegian Staff

The recent appointment of three associate deans in the College of Arts and Sciences is expected to strengthen many areas in the college and bring about many changes.

Thomas Isenhour, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, appointed the following as associate deans: Judy Zivanovic, former faculty member at South Dakota State University; Marvin Kaiser, associate professor of sociology, anthropology and social work; and Jack Holl, former chief historian and archivist with the U.S. Department of Energy.

The new associate deans were appointed to help "strengthen the area of research and graduate education, to improve the fine arts areas and to secure federal grants," said William Feyerharm, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

Zivanovic's job primarily will be centered on fine arts, fundraising, undergraduate curriculum, affirmative action and personal facilities, said Shirley Olson, administrative assistant in the College of Arts and Sciences.

Kaiser will be responsible for faculty and budget planning and Holl, who will assume his position in January, will be in charge of graduate studies and grant development, Olson said.

A national search for the new associate deans began in the spring and ended in June, Feyerharm said. The positions held by Kaiser and Zivanovic will last one year positions. The temporary positions will be filled with full-time faculty by next semester, Feyerharm said.

Zivanovic said she is entering a positive atmosphere and expects her new position to be exciting.

"I've really enjoyed my stay with the people, the faculty, and the students. The college is a strong institution," she said.

The job is interesting because the dean and associate dean form a team using various strengths of the college, such as grants and the freshman seminar program, she said.

Zivanovic said another exciting aspect of being associate dean is the opportunity to get advice from someone with expertise in an unfamiliar area and then having them come back for help in an area with which they are unfamiliar.

Dukakis hurt by his handling of the L-word

Commentary

CATHERINE DOUD
Collegian Columnist

Is he or isn't he?
If he is, exactly what kind is he?
And, no matter what kind he is, does it really make any difference?

These are some of the questions that might be going through many people's minds concerning Michael Dukakis.

Has he been properly labeled with the dreaded L-word and is thus doomed to end his political career in disgrace? Or has he been slandered because he really isn't one of those nasty L-word do-gooders after all? It's really hard to tell, especially since Dukakis himself can't seem to make up his mind about what exactly he is.

Ever since Bush and the Republican Party tried to mark him as a true-blue liberal months ago, Dukakis has been denying it hotly. Apparently, to be called a liberal is the political kiss of death.

Suddenly comic strips across the country, like Bloom County and Doonesbury, began running strips showing how the word liberal ruins a presidential candidate's chances of being elected. Meanwhile, the Dukakis camp tried — too late and too ineffectively — to remove the liberal label.

Bush's campaign, which never shies away from maliciousness when it comes to the opponent, gleefully continued to enforce the liberal label which it had placed upon Dukakis. Only three weeks ago, Dukakis commented upon Bush's frequent use of the term and wryly wished he had a dollar for every time he had heard it used in the campaign.

But suddenly, Sunday, everything changed. With little time left before the election, and with Dukakis trailing significantly in the polls, the Duke abruptly changed his mind.

"Yes, I'm a liberal," he declared during a whistle-stop tour of Southern California.

Now, why would Dukakis suddenly embrace the label which had caused him so much distress only weeks ago?

Of course, he did qualify the term. He described himself as a liberal in the sense of Franklin Roosevelt, Harry Truman and John Kennedy. (Yes, it's true, another comparison to Kennedy.)

Now, if we are to suppose that these three previous presidents were all the same sort of liberal, "good liberals" we might call them, then what exactly is the negative connotation of the word liberal that Dukakis is trying so hard to avoid and that Bush seems to think is utterly repugnant?

The Webster's New World Dictionary describes a liberal as: "Tolerant of views different from one's own, broad-minded ... (those who prefer) democratic or republican forms of government, as distinguished from aristocracies and monarchies, etc. — favoring political reform, tending towards democracy and personal freedom for the individual, progressive."

Now goodness, who would want to be labeled as broad-minded and tolerant of other views? Even worse, who would stand behind someone who was in favor of personal freedoms and a democratic government?

Let's be serious. This is not what Bush means when he calls Dukakis a liberal. Just look at some of his pointed political ads where he shows Dukakis as a softy on crime for releasing and pardoning criminals in his home state. Even worse, a man whose administration has already spent more than most people can imagine wants us to believe that a liberal probably will raise taxes and spend, spend, spend.

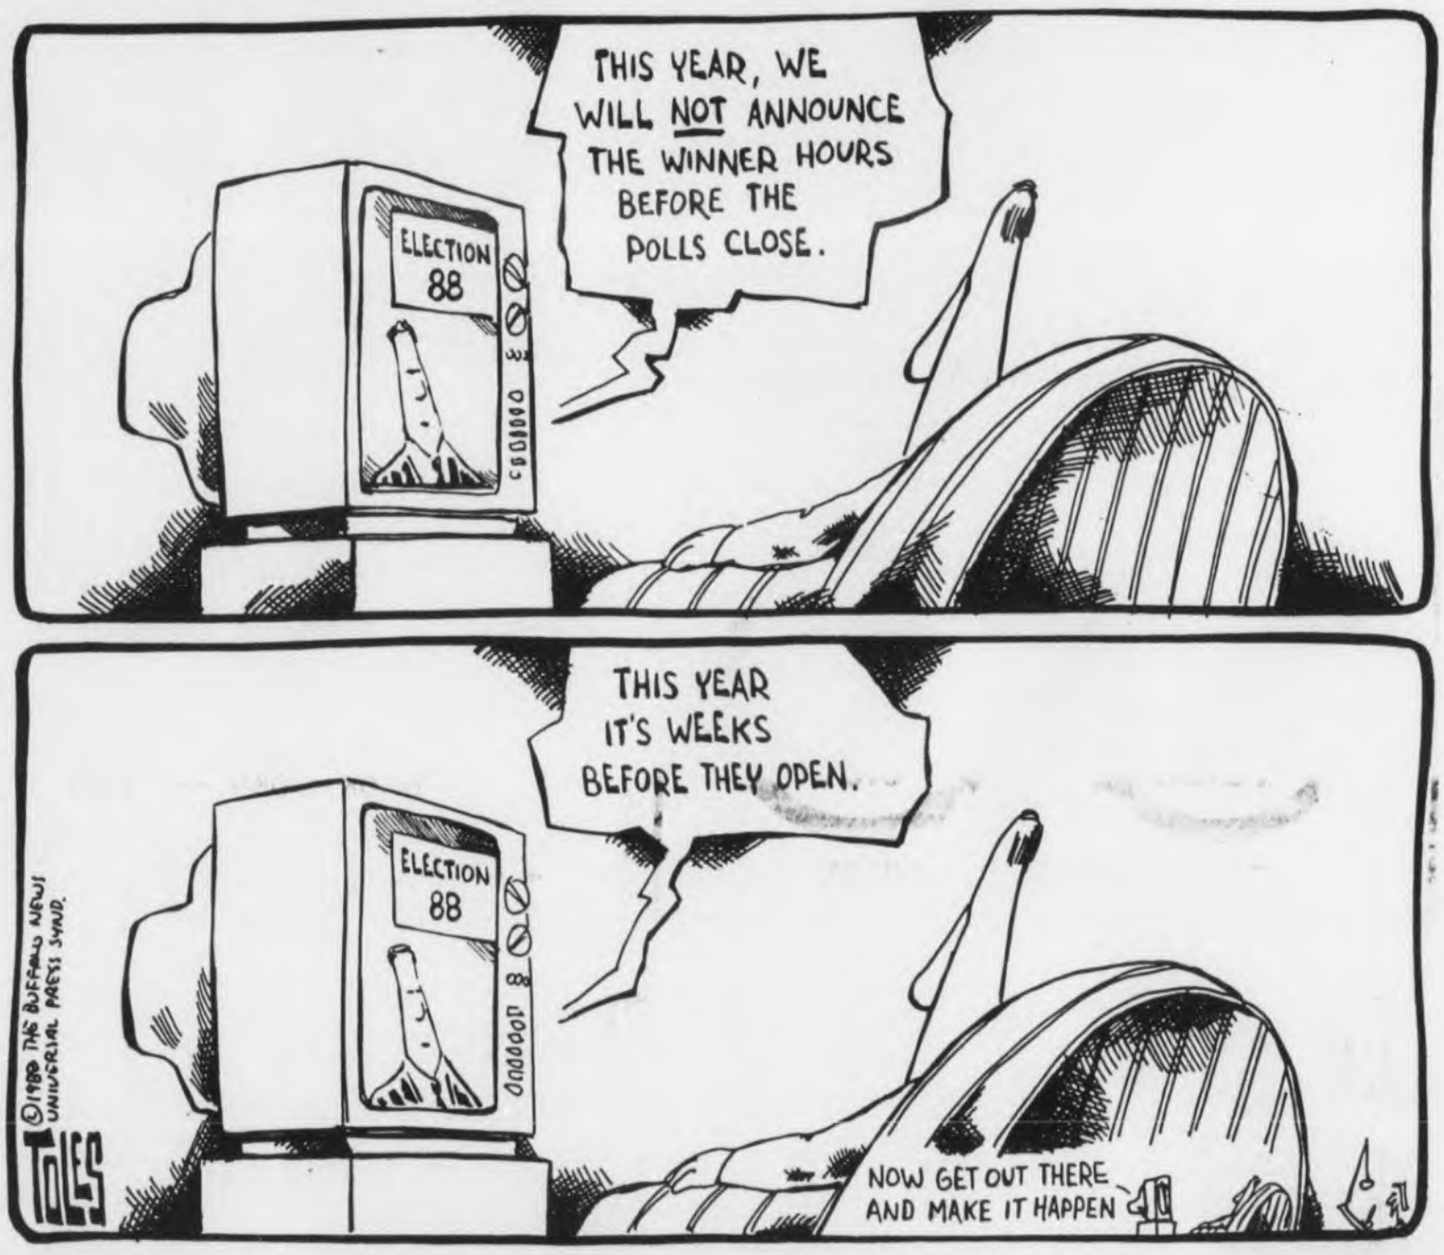
So, as far as Dukakis is concerned, there are two kinds of liberals, the criminal lovers and the free, innovative thinkers, and he suddenly has decided that yes, he is a liberal.

Why? Maybe because he is behind in the polls anyway, and the Dukakis camp is trying anything innovative to swing more votes. If it takes calling himself a liberal or challenging Bush to a debate the night before the election, then so be it.

Unfortunately for Dukakis, this sudden admission of liberal tendencies isn't going to help him at all. This is just another example of the Democratic Party reacting too slowly and inadequately to accusations by the Republicans. If Dukakis would have been ready to answer that he was indeed a liberal, just like Kennedy and the others, the first time he was labeled as one instead of turning tail and fleeing from the term as if it were a scarlet letter, then maybe things would be different.

As it is, not only is Dukakis a liberal, be it good or bad, but he has also shown himself to be indecisive and unsure of his true political standing. Blunders of this sort, more than the actual qualifications of the candidates, will be what will continue to select our presidents for us.

Other candidates exist besides Dukakis, Bush



The choice in this year's presidential election has been described by many as "the lesser of two evils."

Yet it doesn't have to be that way. Although we have already endorsed Michael Dukakis, the lesser of the two evils, for president, every serious voter should consider the list of third-party candidates in this year's election.

Granted, it won't be easy. The media doesn't adequately cover third parties, arguing that they are out of the mainstream. But it is the media that has, in large part, created that mainstream. It has limited the spectrum of issues and ideas seen by Americans, creating a choice between candidates about as different as Coke and Pepsi.

It is also argued that third parties don't have enough of a following to be considered important. But a number of third parties conduct traditional campaigns, often taking a sharper focus on issues than the major parties take. Furthermore, recent polls suggest that third parties could be influential enough to swing the vote from the Democrats to the Republicans in key states such as Illinois and New York. And with growing voter discontent over the major parties, as well as division within the major parties, America may be primed for the emergence of a major third party.

This makes it all the more troubling that election laws in many states, including Kansas, restrict third parties' access to ballots. Kansas State Statute 25-304 requires that all parties on a ballot have a two-word name, the second word being "party." Though no real harm has been done by this statute, it reflects the determination of the two major parties to pass laws which solidify their hold on the national political agenda.

We have to serve the truth as candidates for public office and not mislead, misguide, misdirect the people merely to provoke emotional responses and win votes that way.

Trust is often hard to learn

Commentary

KAREN ALLEN
Guest Columnist

C'mon, you've got to trust me on this one.

My brother was famous for using that line when we were kids — especially when the gang needed one more player for a rousing game of Nerf football in sub-zero temperatures.

Many parties have been attended because my friends used that line as a form of persuasion. And although my education means a great deal, I have to admit I succumb to their beer pressure the majority of the time.

Words to the same effect will echo through campus in the next month as students preregister. Friends will try to convince their roomies to enroll in PSYCH 1000: Psychology of the Sexual Behaviors of the Post-Adolescent Cheetah — because they heard it only has one test and awesome films.

Asking people to trust you is one way of asking them to believe and support your ideas and values. It feels good when someone trusts you enough to take your word. They are telling you they respect your judgment and will act on your advice.

One of the biggest obstacles in beginning a relationship is learning to trust each other. Most of us are all too ready to make false assumptions during the first few weeks of dating. You want to believe the words or actions of the one who has stolen your heart, but, at the same time, you don't want to be branded a fool.

And the reasoning for this lack of trust is simple — it's hard to have faith in someone you barely know. When a friend or family member violates your trust, you may be leery of them for a long time. But because you either (A) love them, or (B) have to live with them in a room the size of a walk-in closet, eventually you call a truce.

But it's different when the person who violated your trust is an acquaintance or, heaven forbid, a stranger. It takes a lot longer to get over being duped by someone who will probably never beg your forgiveness. Sadly enough, some people become hardened and lose their trust in humans altogether. They decide they can't trust anybody and go about life with a chisel in one hand and a hammer in the other — ready to pick apart anything they hear that might be untrue.

Last week I was in Atlanta for an Associated Collegiate Press convention. After an evening of frivolity, two companions and I discovered the Dunk-n-Dine, an all-night restaurant offering good food, southern hospitality and, best of all, cheap prices.

Soon after seating ourselves in a semiclean booth, we noticed one of the customers staring at us. The man was poorly dressed, in need of a shave and missing one eye. He approached us and, in a shaky voice, told us that although he could barely see, we were the "prettiest gifts from heaven" he'd seen in a long time.

We began to feel sorry for the man, and that sorrow was magnified when he told us he was waiting for an eye transplant from Emory University. He told one of my companions she reminded him of his daughter, who was at home in Texas waiting for news of his upcoming surgery.

His only request of us was to allow him to play a song for us on the jukebox. We sat in silence with tears in our eyes until our meal came, trying hard not to look at him and his eye socket.

Then something weird happened. Just as we were paying our bill, he moved outside to wait for us. And when we reached him by the curb, he hit us with his well-rehearsed pitch. Could he please have a little money? All he had ordered was a sandwich and a cup of coffee, and couldn't we spare a dollar so he could pay his bill?

I handed him a dollar in disgust, as did my other friends. We were angry because we felt like we had been used. My experience with street beggars is minimal, but those that I had seen before were upfront about it. Never had I met one whose story was so outlandish. From then on, I did not stop when a beggar asked me for money. My grip was tightening on the chisel. I was determined not to let another stranger make me look like a fool.

On the final evening in Atlanta, we headed for an area known as Buckhead to sample suburban night life. More frivolity caused us to miss the last subway, and soon we found ourselves faced with one heck of a long walk back to our hotel. Like the crazy college students that we are, we tried to hitchhike. And, lo and behold, a compact car made a U-turn and headed our way.

Four of us piled in with the Atlanta businessman and began to describe our situation. When we asked why he stopped, he told us we looked like a bunch of crazy college kids (what a coincidence) who were definitely lost. We insisted he go to breakfast with us and we spent the next two hours talking politics in a booth at, of course, the Dunk-n-Dine.

He told us about his years as a fighter pilot and an injury he received as a result of his plane going down over the Indian Ocean. He asked us what we wanted to do with our lives and he really listened to what we had to say. We basically had to wrestle him to the ground to keep from paying the tab, and in the end he gave us all a hug or a handshake and wished us good luck.

That Atlanta businessman took the chisel out of my hand. He made me realize that you can't get down on everyone for another person's actions. For as many strangers as there are in this world who want to con money off you, no matter what their situation is, there is a businessman named Tom Johnson just waiting to give you a free ride.

Drug testing dispute argued before court

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court, confronting drug testing in the American workplace for the first time, was urged by Attorney General Dick Thornburgh and his top courtroom lawyer on Wednesday to uphold mandatory tests for many railroad and Customs Service employees.

The importance attached to the pair of cases by the administration was underscored by Thornburgh's participation, marking the first time that an attorney general appeared before the high court since President Reagan took office. He was joined by Solicitor General Charles Fried.

Former Attorney General Edwin Meese, Thornburgh's immediate predecessor, observed the arguments from the spectator seats.

"This is a case about railway safety," said Thornburgh, who presented the administration's position in a dispute over mandatory blood and urine tests for railroad workers after accidents or rules violations.

He said the case was about "the hazards created by use of drugs and alcohol by those in charge of trains."

Thornburgh stumbled a few times when the justices asked him about some of the specifics of the testing program.

"I'm not going to palm myself off on this court as an expert," Thornburgh said.

He last argued before the high court in 1977 when he headed the Justice Department's criminal division. The last time an attorney general argued before the justices was in 1980, when Benjamin Civiletti presented the Carter administration's side in a Nazi deportation case.

If Thornburgh encountered some problems Wednesday, his opponent in the case appeared to fare even worse.

Sharp questions were repeatedly directed at Lawrence Mann, an attorney for the railway workers who said the drug tests are unconstitutional because they are incapable of proving on-the-job impairment.

"Neither the alcohol nor the drug test can demonstrate impairment," he said. For example, he said, the tests can show residue from a drug that may have been taken "by someone 60 days ago in the privacy of their home."

Justice Antonin Scalia asked if it weren't "reasonable for the railroad to want to know" if someone responsible for train safety has "cocaine traces" in their system.

The idea, Scalia continued, "is to prevent someone using cocaine from driving the train the next time."

Justice Anthony Kennedy, sounding incredulous, asked Mann: "The public has no interest in knowing about chronic drug use as long as the worker is not using drugs on duty?"

Justice Thurgood Marshall scolded Mann for spending too much time attacking the reliability of urine tests as opposed to blood tests.

"You have to win on both tests" to kill the drug-testing program, Marshall said. "Aim at both of them."

Fried, the administration's top courtroom lawyer, defended the Customs Service program in which urine tests are required for anyone applying for a promotion or transfer to a job involving drug enforcement.

Play to explore cultural issues

"I am not what I was 10 years ago or 10 minutes ago. I'm all of that and then some. And whereas I can't live inside yesterday's pain, I can't live without it."
— George C. Wolfe, "The Colored Museum."

The place: The Purple Masque Theatre.

The time: 8 p.m. Nov. 3, 4, & 5.

The event: Museum Grand Opening.

The Ebony Theatre Company invites the students of K-State and the community of Manhattan to the opening night of the most innovative animated museum the world has seen.

A museum is a place of history. It provides society the opportunity to view the past with the purpose of interpreting the present and determining the future.

It is no wonder that playwright George C. Wolfe used the metaphor of a museum to construct his award-winning Broadway show "The Colored Museum." Wolfe's play will provide its audience a tour through issues and images of modern black culture.

"'The Colored Museum' attempts to make people aware of the ongoing changes in, and society's images of, black culture," said Anne Butler, faculty advisor for Ebony. "Through these 'exhibits,' Wolfe offers us something similar to a tour through a museum, offering a glimpse at issues and stereotypes linked to black culture."

The exhibits Butler refers to appear to the audience as vignettes. Wolfe uses these short scenes to provide the audience with a personal look at several interesting individuals. The actors in "The Colored Museum" are not portraying people as much as they are characterizing stereotypes and misconceptions about black culture.

Upon entering "The Colored Museum," the audience is immediately exposed to Wolfe's dry comedic drama. The first exhibit is Miss Pat, a modern-day stewardess aboard the surrealistic "Celebrity Slaveship." Other exhibits include players from "The Last Mama-on-the-Couch" theater and two wigs who are fighting over the rights to their owner's head.

The complex dramatic structure of Wolfe's show, coupled with a difficult score, required Ebony to start rehearsals in early September. The size and difficulty of this production shows the recent growth in the Ebony Theatre Company.

Butler attributes the quality of this production to several factors.

"Having theater majors involved in Ebony has really helped us put this season together. We have great talent and plenty of human resources. With appropriate support from the University, the sky is the limit."

Turnout unaffected by enrollment rise

By Amy Lyons
Collegian Reporter and Erwin Seba
Senior Staff Writer

Despite an enrollment increase of about 1,300, voter turnout for this year's student body election remained approximately the same as the 1987 election, according to figures provided by the Student Governing Association elections committee.

Out of a total enrollment of 19,301 students, 2,543 ballots were cast Tuesday and Wednesday. Last year, only 20 more ballots were cast out of a total enrollment of 18,040.

During the 1986 SGA election, 3,823 ballots were cast out of a total student enrollment of 17,630.

Sally Routson, coordinator of student activites and SGA adviser, attributed the turnout to the lack of any clear-cut issues in the campaign.

"I think issues are the whole thing. I didn't think going to three places would make a difference and it didn't," Routson said.

The number of polling places was increased from one to three for this year's voting. Polling places were located in Derby Food Center and Cardwell Hall in addition to the Union.

Routson said ballots were tallied in the Farrell Library Computing Center by key-punch computer. Write-in ballots were hand-tallied.

"Our numbers were right on target as far as signatures and the number of ballots," she said.

The number of candidates whose names appeared on the ballot, including those vying for Board of Student Publications positions, totaled 119. The number of offices open was 56.

In the College of Agriculture, four positions were open.

Anne Krauss, junior in agriculture education and agriculture senator-elect, said winning felt twice as good.

"It's something I really wanted," she said. In 1987, Krauss considered running for Senate but did not file for office. She then ran as a write-in candidate and lost.

There were 14 positions open in the College of Arts and Sciences.

Doug Holle, sophomore in preoptometry and arts and sciences senator-elect, said he was happy about the results.

Holle, who served as a Senate intern last year, said "I'm looking forward to going to the meetings and seeing it from that perspective."

In the College of Business Administration, nine positions were open.

Jill Rathbun, junior in management and business senator-elect, said providing quality instruction was a priority for her.

"As a student of the business college, I'm concerned about the increasing student-to-teacher ratio," she said. "We need to be able to provide quality teachers."

Rathbun said she supports increasing faculty salaries through continuance of the Margin of Excellence.

Four positions were open in the College of Education.

Kirk Schuler, sophomore in preprofessional elementary education and education senator-elect, said he planned to be accessible to his constituents.

"Last year, I had basically no impact on how my senators voted. They didn't listen and weren't accessible. I ran to change that," Schuler said.

"I plan to meet this year's demands as they come," he said.

Eight positions were open in the College of Engineering.

Carrie Davies, junior in mechanical engineering and engineering senator-elect, said more information needs to be provided to students in the college about the proposed $10-per-credit-hour engineering fee.

"I think people in the college are basically against it (the fee), but if they knew more about it, they would understand its purpose," Davies said.

In the Graduate School race, four out of six open positions were filled.

Michael Steinle, graduate in business administration and graduate senator-elect, said balancing the time required of being both a senator and a graduate student would be difficult.

"Traditionally, I know graduate students haven't been overly enthusiastic about Senate. I'm a little bit leery about the time it's going to take, but we'll see how it goes," Steinle said.

Among Friends

K-Staters, like students across the nation, are filling the empty slots in their schedules with community service work. For example, more than 2,000 of Yale University's 5,100 undergraduates participate in community service, according to a recent issue of Change magazine.

Campus Compact and Campus Outreach Opportunity League are two organizations promoting student community service projects at colleges.

Compact was formed in 1985 when the presidents of Brown, Georgetown and Stanford agreed to lead the program, according to the magazine.

"Compact is an organization that involves (university) presidents who want to provide students with community service opportunties, but, more importantly, these presidents believe community service should be an integral part of higher education," said Carol Peak, program director of the K-State Community Service Progam.

Bethany College in Lindsborg is the only Kansas college participating in Compact.

COOL is directed toward experiential learning. The program operates on the belief that students learn through working in community service, Peak said.

"COOL is a student organization. It looks for student leaders to start the organization on campus. I believe that COOL and Compact are evidence of this national trend," Peak said.

The Adolph Coors Co. started a volunteer program aimed at young people called Volunteers Under 30. This program, which began this year, promotes this effort with ads in national magazines such as Glamour, People and Vogue.

The Volunteers Under 30 program has a brochure that lists organizations to which young people could volunteer time. The program also helps connect students with the organizations.

Peak said she thinks the fact that governors in some states are pushing for post-secondary community service requirements in education shows how important community service is becoming. Before graduating, Bethany students must enroll in courses that require community service.

K-State has joined other universities in establishing a program to promote student community service.

The Community Service Program of K-State was made possible by a two-year grant from the Fund for the Improvement of Post-secondary Education.

"There is clearly a resurgence and interest in students and universities in voluntarism and public service," said Marvin Kaiser, associate dean of the College of Arts and Sciences and author of the grant.

Peak named three goals of the Community Service Program:

■ To provide students with a range of community service activities, such as long- and short-term projects. Some of the projects require academic training, while others do not.

■ To offer scholarships and stipends to students. The program is concerned some students could not take advantage of the program for economic reasons.

■ To acquaint students with rural Kansas communities and to help students learn about citizenship and community life.

The K-State program is modeled after other University programs. Four parts make up the Community Service Program at K-State:

■ SAVE gives individuals or groups an opportunity to participate in a one-day community service project.

■ Summer Team Projects involves groups of students with interdisciplinary educations that work in a community for eight weeks during the summer.

■ CSP Clearinghouse connects students interested in volunteering with interested organizations.

■ Mini-Grants fund individual or student-group projects that are directed at community issues through a service project.

All of portions of the program are run by students.

Peak said she thinks the first year of this program has been successful.

Helene Higbee, senior in marketing, was a summer team project member.

"Too many people have gotten away from helping others when everyone has time to do this and is capable. It makes me feel good about myself when I am helping others, even when I am helping on a low scale," Higbee said.

The program is not a member of Compact now. Peak would like Jon Wefald to work to make the program a member of Compact, she said.

Peak and Kaiser said they believe strongly in community service.

"It is important for everyone to become a part of a community. Communities are good places to live because we each contribute to make it that way. It's important as educated citizens to get involved and take this community involvement as a duty," Peak said.

Shannon Butchart, senior in social sciences, imitates one of the animals to Wesley, while they wait for lunch.

Karla Johnston, senior in leisure studies, sits on a bench with Kim as they take a break from walking. The volunteers were working in association with the Community S.A.V.E. program.

Bonne Carr, junior in social work and Jimmy watch some animals at the Sunset Zoo in Manhattan.

Car crises preventable

By Julie Thompson
Collegian Reporter

Aside from a car accident, being stranded on the roadside can be a driver's worst fear. Taking precautions before leaving on a trip can help prevent some emergencies.

Preparing for the worst might eliminate a life-threatening event, said Sgt. Stan Conkwright, of the Riley County Police Department.

"We want people to help themselves," Conkwright said.

The most important precaution drivers should take is telling someone the planned route and the expected time of arrival, he said.

If the motorist doesn't arrive, the waiting party can notify the authorities with the vehicle's description and license plate number, Conkwright said.

"The law will do a welfare check across the state to try and make sure there isn't a life-threatening situation on hand," he said.

Although some storms give little or no warning to motorists, Conkwright said, most weather conditions can be monitored in advance.

"Call for a weather check and road conditions. This is especially useful for out-of-state driving," he said.

Before the winter months, vehicles should be serviced or inspected. Clay Umscheid, manager of Kerr McGee service station, said he tells his customers their vehicles should be inspected before winter.

"We even want them to have an inspection done twice per year. We might need to change a radiator or belts that would cause problems," Umscheid said.

Tires that wear well can also help driving performance during poor weather. All-weather tires have the best traction in wet weather, said Jerry Roberts, owner of Jerry's Phillips 66 Service.

"In wet weather conditions, such as thunderstorms, you won't experience hydroplaning because the tires have a tread that channels the water out," Roberts said.

Drivers should put other precautionary items, such as blankets, sand for traction and non-perishable food and water, in their vehicle before traveling, Conkwright said.

"Call for a weather check and road conditions. This is especially useful for out-of-state driving."

—Sgt. Stan Conkwright Riley County Police Department

"It's also a good idea to travel with more than half a tank of gas. This helps if you need to run the car for heat," said Lt. Robert Mellgren, of the KSU Police.

Being stranded during a snowstorm creates additional problems. Even familiar places along the road can become strange when visibility is low, Mellgren said.

Passengers should stay in the car instead of walking for help. This increases the chance of being seen and rescued. Also, the vehicle keeps out the harsh weather.

"Don't walk away from any shelter you've got," Conkwright said.

Only in flash flood situations should drivers leave their vehicle in order to find higher ground, he said.

If the weather is very cold, run the vehicle briefly for heat.

"Run the motor only if it is so cold you can't stand it. If you do run the car, crack the window a half of an inch so that fresh air will circulate throughout the car. Don't listen to the radio and run down the battery," Conkwright said.

Motorists can also signal other motorists or the highway patrol for help.

"(Motorists) can put a white rag on the driver's side of the window and, in certain conditions, raise the hood. This lets the highway patrol know that there are problems," he said.

Sun-shade visors, put behind the windshield and reading, "Call Police," have become popular. Mellgren said he believes, however, the visors have an adverse effect on getting help.

"People have misused them, so (motorists) really don't take the visors seriously," he said.

Weather bothers cars

Warm up unnecessary

By The Collegian Staff

With the arrival of colder weather and with winter on its way, many people do not realize the pros and cons of allowing their cars to warm up before driving.

Letting a car run for several minutes does more harm than good, according to the Car Care Council.

Due to the fast idle, the car is burning gas at an excessive rate, said Dave Prater, manager of University Amoco.

Oil contamination is risked when condensation from the cold engine begins to form, Prater said.

The Car Care Council says warm-ups could lead to the catalytic converter overheating, and thus to car fires.

However, "If everything is in its place and working properly, there is little chance of a catalytic converter overheating and causing a fire," Prater said. "Warm-up periods are necessary."

A fresh air intake should prevent such overheating.

Engine size determines the time a car takes to reach operating temperature. Usually, a car will warm up in about five to 10 minutes.

"The high idle will kick off around five minutes," Prater said.

Cold air can affect fuel mixture; engine damage a possibility

By Stephanie Morrill
Collegian Reporter

As cold weather approaches, precautions need to be taken to ensure that cars run efficiently — one of which may not be obvious.

Sluggish performance is a common winter driving symptom. The car may run poorly, stall or get poor gas mileage.

The cause of this problem may be a damaged or missing "heat riser" tube, according to the Car Care Council.

The heat riser is a flexible metal duct which conducts heat from the exhaust manifold to the air-cleaner intake.

It also connects with a fresh air duct at the air-cleaning housing, where a temperature-controlled valve combines hot and cold air to maintain the correct temperature.

The ideal temperature for the air is between 70 and 90 degrees, but varies for some cars.

"We try to get 100-degree air going into the engine," said Dennis Chard, technician at Burnett Automotive in Manhattan.

"Since cold gas doesn't evaporate well, we need to get heat into the engine to help it evaporate," Chard said.

A car uses 14 gallons of air for each gallon of gas it burns. "This is ideal," he said.

Too much air or too-hot air can result in a lean mixture, which may cause power loss, excessive emissions and severe engine damage, according to the Car Care Council.

"The heat riser tube should be checked any time your car is due for a tune-up," Chard said.

This is done to prevent excessive emission problems, which occur when a vehicle burns nitrogen and emits nitrogen fumes.

When the snow starts falling, your car will be calling.

Preparation can prevent winter-related breakdowns

By Susan Faler
Collegian Reporter

Fall is the time for car owners to prepare their cars for the harsh winter months.

"Winter is bad on cars. So, it's a good idea to get them checked over before winter hits. This way, you don't have problems starting it in winter time," said Wendell Fritzson, service manager at Goetsch-Irvine Motor Co., Inc.

Several areas of car care need to be checked over before winter approaches. These include the oil, antifreeze, hoses, tires, water in the battery, wiper blades and washer fluid.

Changing the oil and its filter is a top priority and needs to be done every 6,000 miles or every six months, which ever comes first.

"Your oil needs to be changed because town driving causes moisture to get in it, turning (the oil) into acid, causing it to build up and deteriorate the engine," Fritzson said. "Your engine will deteriorate more critically during the winter than in the summer."

A 10W-40 oil can be used year-round or a 30 weight for warm weather and a 20-20W for cold. A 5W-30 is recommended for very cold weather.

There should be plenty of antifreeze in the radiator so water will not freeze. If it does freeze, the car will fail to start.

If the radiator water level is low, a mixture of half water and half antifreeze needs to be added to the radiator. The cooling system needs at least 50 percent antifreeze all year.

"Without water in your battery, it can burn up and then it begins to fry things," Fritzson said.

The radiator can be tested to determine whether antifreeze or water needs to be added. Also, the antifreeze should be green. Antifreeze which is brown should be changed. If it is left in the radiator, rusting will begin, Fritzson said.

Hoses are vital in the cooling and heating of the engine. Water and antifreeze are carried through rubber hoses from the engine into the radiator. The water cools as it passes through the radiator and then travels through another rubber hose back into the engine.

"Hoses are actually a maintenance item, but can be checked by eye and should be checked every 30,000 miles or three years," Fritzson said.

Good tire care is important in driving safety and an extra tire should always be carried for an emergency.

"Tire pressure is usually kept at about 32-35 pounds in each tire. If the balance is off, it can ruin your tire alignment," Fritzson said. "You sure don't want to get stuck in the cold changing a tire."

All of the tires should be the same size and type as specified in most owner's manuals. Motorists should also carry the tools needed for changing a tire such as tire pressure gauges, tread depth indicator, a jack and a lug wrench.

Reststops risky
Vandalism, robbery common in places

By The Collegian Staff

Imagine driving down Interstate 70 listening to the radio. Suddenly, the soda pop consumed 60 miles back is making the search for a restroom a must.

After looking around for a couple of miles, desperation sets in, but no towns are in sight. Finally, a blue sign is spotted that says, "Reststop — 2 miles."

Estimates by the Kansas Highway Patrol state that more than 200 motorists use reststops across Kansas each day. Motorists making such a stop should take some precautions.

Criminal activities, such as robbery and vandalism, are common at reststops, said Sgt. Terry Maple of the Kansas Highway Patrol.

"Use common sense — not using it is what gets people into trouble. We try to get troopers through the reststops as much as we can, but we can't be everywhere all the time," Maple said.

Sgt. Stan Conkwright, of the Riley County Police Department, offered these safety tips to motorists who use reststops.

- Use common sense.
- Don't leave your car unattended or unlocked.
- Watch people in the area to see how they are behaving.
- Be aware of what is happening around the parking lot and the building.
- Avoid stopping at night, especially when alone.

Maple said he agrees with Conkwright's tip on using common sense, but also suggested calling the police if someone has car trouble while at a reststop.

Using precaution and common sense may save time and trouble and will allow drivers to use the reststop as it is intended to be used — as a rest stop, he said.

Evaluations provide student feedback

By Alan Wilds
Collegian Reporter

Student evaluations, conducted near the end of each semester, are one of the major methods by which faculty members annually are evaluated, said Robert Kruh, associate provost.

Because the University has a primary emphasis on the teaching program, student evaluations of instructors are important, he said.

The evaluations provide feedback for faculty members and indicate areas of improvement, Kruh said.

In addition, department participation and scholarly activities are also considered.

"We want our faculty to be contributors to their fields," Kruh said.

He also said faculty members' public service and projects outside the University also are considered.

Kruh said if the outcome of a faculty member's evaluation shows negative signs, the first step is a meeting between the instructor and the department head.

"If negative aspects are found, it could raise questions," he said.

If a problem is indicated, the first step would be for the department head or college dean to give the faculty member ways to improve.

"Suspension or dismissal is the worst thing that could happen," Kruh said.

These penalties, he said, rarely occur.

"The people who do superb jobs get promotions and salary increases," he said.

Kruh said tenured faculty are no more sheltered from the annual evaluations than non-tenured personnel.

"We are also very attentive in rewarding tenure to people," he said.

Robert Grindell, head of the English department, said evaluations can have negative and positive effects. He conducts an annual evaluation for every English faculty member.

"Raises depend on evaluations and can range anywhere from 3.6 to 25 percent," Grindell said.

He said the department head makes the initial decision on the status of faculty members. He said consistently bad evaluations could be serious and can result in termination.

Jerry Phares, head of the psychology department, said student survey evaluations are optional for tenured faculty. Most of the non-tenured members do have evaluations submitted to the department head, he said.

KU establishes minority strategy

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — A University of Kansas task force has outlined a strategy for ensuring that a nourishing academic atmosphere is provided to minority faculty, staff and students.

Judith Ramaley, executive vice chancellor for the Lawrence campus, said she looked upon the seven-page report as an "action agenda." The task force did not establish minority recruitment targets as some universities in the Midwest have done.

Ramaley appointed the Minority Issues Task Force in March in response to tensions that developed when members of the Ku Klux Klan were invited to speak on campus.

In the report released Wednesday, the task force said KU must undertake an aggressive and a coordinated drive to recruit minorities, create an atmosphere encouraging minorities to succeed and help the campus community understand the value of cultural diversity.

The 24-member task force, which will remain in place for a year to study the implementation of its recommendations, identified 10 ways to boost the number of minority faculty, staff and students and eight methods of teaching people to cherish cultural diversity.

Final statistics won't be compiled until December, but preliminary estimates indicate there are about 100 minority-group members among nearly 1,100 faculty at the university. Enrollment of minority students increased 3.5 percent this fall to 1,597.

Some recommendations of the task force:

- Determine ways to increase scholarship and other financial support for undergraduate and graduate minority students.
- Coordinate minority postdoctoral fellowship programs with departmental recruiting so successful participants can be prepared for tenure-track appointments.

Dallas takes chance on tight end Dean

File/Jim Dietz

Former K-State tight end Kent Dean, after being signed by the Dallas Cowboys as a free agent, has spent this year on the injured reserve list after shattering his arm during training camp prior to the season.

Ex-'Cat star still on Cowboys' payroll despite preseason injury

By Mike Rouse
Sports Writer

Everything seemed great after former K-State tight end Kent Dean was signed by the Dallas Cowboys early this year, but then an injury sidelined him for the season.

Dean shattered his arm during a training camp practice over the summer in California. Surgery put two metal plates and 11 screws in his arm.

Dean found pro practices, even in tryouts, to be grueling and more mentally demanding than the generally physical college workouts.

"It's a lot more physical in college than in the pros," Dean said. "In college, the coaches have you work on blocking and catching drills, and in the pros, they give you a playbook about the size of the Los Angeles phone book and work on those plays during practices."

In the pro tryouts, Dean said, you can't expect anyone to help you.

"At that point, it is all for yourself. The players put everything they have learned over the years into one training session. It is a pretty stressful period," Dean said.

Dean made the team, but was put on injured reserve for the year. Dean's cast was removed three weeks ago, which technically allows the team to release him, but Dean said it will keep him for next year.

"I've made the team for this year, but that doesn't mean I will make it next year, because everyone tries out for the team every year," he said.

The Cowboys gave Dean a two-year contract with the amount of money not stated. Dean said that if he had been active, he would have grossed well into six digits. He lost around $10,000 by not being active on the roster. Dean said he is still getting his full contracted wage even though he is on injured reserve.

Dean said his chances of making the team next year are very good. The Cowboys brought in a specialist from Califronia to perform his surgery, and the team gave him the freedom to come to Manhattan whenever he wants, which Dean feels is a good clue Dallas has liked what he has done for the team.

"When you get put on injured reserve, the team usually makes you stay in Dallas. But they let me come back to Manhattan, and they send me information in the mail," Dean said.

Dean returned to Manhattan during the season to receive his degree, which he was 15 hours short of before leaving K-State.

"Dallas wanted me to get my degree this year so when I come back to camp next spring, I can concentrate on football and not have to worry about school," he said.

While on injured reserve, Dean doesn't have many commitments with the team.

"They give me the freedom to do what I want, and they are paying for my trips down there for some of the team meetings," he said. "I really don't have any commitments except to get this damn arm ready for the next training camp."

Over the winter, Dean will have the plates in his arm removed. He will undergo rehabilitation over the spring and summer. The doctors told him that the cast would be on three months and that Dean wouldn't be able to play until next spring, which Dean thought was a long time.

"I have never been out of football for such a long time before, but now that I think about it, it's not that long off," he said.

"I will go through surgery in the winter and then begin to build my strength back up to a level in which I can compete at," he said.

When Dean does return to camp, his main goals are to play as well as he did before he was hurt and to make the team.

"I didn't get to show a lot, and one good thing is that Doug Cosbie (the Cowboys' starting tight end) might retire, so it looks like they might use me and one other," he said.

Dean has found it hard to watch any football.

"It feels kind of weird right now not playing football, so I haven't been watching a whole lot of football. The only thing I have done is watch a few K-State games," he said.

Kent Dean Profile

NFL team: Dallas Cowboys/signed as free agent. Sidelined for 1988 season with arm injury and placed on injured reserve by the team.

K-State career: In four seasons as a Wildcat, Dean caught 50 passes for 652 yards and four touchdowns. All four of those touchdowns were recorded during his senior season, 1987, when he caught 38 passes for 481 yards.

Biggest game of career at K-State: Last season against Iowa State. Dean caught six passes for 85 yards, including a 22-yard touchdown catch in the first quarter of a 16-14 Wildcat loss.

Kruger: Glover not likely to return

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

"It wasn't a good decision on his part. He needed the summer work to be eligible. He knew that going in. At the time we were very surprised, because he was doing well in his classes and everything seemed to be going just fine."

—Lon Kruger men's basketball coach

All of the speculation about former K-State guard Buster Glover was finally put to an end Wednesday at the Wildcats' annual media day.

Glover, a senior, is not on the K-State roster, but could possibly regain his scholarship at semester's end if he takes care of his academic problems. Coach Lon Kruger said that he wasn't sure that was going to happen.

"It's looking more and more doubtful," he said. "It appears that he is going to have trouble doing that."

Glover's status with the squad made a sudden turn for the worse this summer. He was, everyone thought, returning to summer school at K-State after visiting his family over the Fourth of July weekend at home in Gary, Ind. Instead, he decided to go see his half-brother at the University of Louisville, but didn't tell anyone.

Apparently, he and his half-brother, Jerome Harmon, had some differences that Glover wanted to settle.

Glover was missing for nearly two weeks, and police nationwide were made aware of his disappearance. All of the publicity that Glover received from the national media apparently scared him, and he decided to not call anyone until July 17.

The whole scenario was odd to begin with. Glover needed the summer credits to remain eligible this semester, and he had reportedly been doing well in his classes and was excited about school.

"It wasn't a good decision on his part," Kruger said of Glover's disappearance. "He needed the summer work to be eligible. He knew that going in.

"At the time we were very surprised, because he was doing well in his classes and everything seemed to be going just fine."

Glover had been projected as a possible starter at the shooting guard spot for the Wildcats this year. Glover scored three points a game last year, and along with Barton County transfer LaKeith Humphrey, would have probably been looked upon to help fill the hole left by last year's sharp-shooter, Will Scott.

"I really think Buster could have contributed a lot to this team. He's a great athlete," said Humphrey, who roomed with Glover this summer. "He's a good player to have pushing you to do better in practice, so this team will miss him."

It appears that the summer meeting between Glover and Harmon also had a bad effect for Harmon. He was on Denny Crum's Louisville basketball squad, but also ran into academic problems and is ineligible this semester.

Bears' Ditka suffers mild heart attack

By The Associated Press

LAKE FOREST, Ill. — Chicago Bears coach Mike Ditka suffered a mild heart attack Wednesday after his daily workout at the team's training camp and was hospitalized in serious condition.

The 49-year-old Ditka was alert and conscious and being treated at the intensive care unit of Lake Forest Hospital, said Dr. Jay Alexander a staff cardiologist. Ditka's wife, Diana, was at the hospital with him.

Alexander said he expected Ditka would recover completely, "barring anything unforseen."

Ditka was given medicine for a blocked artery and Alexander said the coach would require hospitalization for at least a week while doctors determined the extent of the blockage.

"It's too soon to say when he will be back and resuming his duties," Alexander said.

Bears president Mike McCaskey, who visited Ditka at the hospital, described the coach as being in good spirits and even joking that he had planned to visit a friend Wednesday at the same hospital anyway.

McCaskey said he would name an assistant coach later this week to direct Sunday's game against Tampa Bay in Ditka's absence.

Both the players and McCaskey agreed the disruption would be minimal because a game plan was nearly completed.

Tennis dual at KU cancelled

The Kansas State women's tennis dual match with Kansas, which was tenatively scheduled for Thursday, has been cancelled, and has not been re-scheduled.

The Wildcats' next action will be Nov. 10-12 in Topeka.

Weiss named top AL rookie

NEW YORK — Shortstop Walt Weiss was selected American League Rookie of the Year Wednesday by the Baseball Writers Association of America, the third straight season a member of the Oakland Athletics has won the honor.

Weiss received 103 points and 17 first-place votes from a panel of 28 writers, two from each AL city.

Gansz names Kenney starter

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Although Bill Kenney was replaced by Steve DeBerg in the fourth quarter of Sunday's 17-10 loss to the Los Angeles Raiders, he'll be in the starting lineup against the Broncos at Denver Sunday.

"There's not enough reason for me to make a change right now," Coach Frank Gansz said Wednesday in announcing that Kenney would get the nod for the third week in a row. "We're close. Closer than we have been. I don't want to start jumping around."

Kenney began the season as the starter, but then Gansz switched to the newly acquired veteran DeBerg in the second game. Later, he said he was going back to Kenney, citing his big-play capability as a hope of putting points on the board.

Williams, Jayhawks try to move on

By The Associated Press

LAWRENCE — The day after his basketball team was placed on probation for three years by the NCAA, Kansas Coach Roy Williams was trying to move on with the business of getting ready for his first season.

Obviously, it wasn't that easy to put the sanctions out of his mind.

"The second day may be tougher than the first," Williams said Wednesday. "The first is shock effect. But I'm very fortunate to be involved with some fine young men. I know they will do their best."

"It's a new day, and we've got to go on from here."

Williams, in his first year at Kansas, broke the news to members of his team early Tuesday morning, before the official announcement of NCAA action against the defending national champion Jayhawks for recruiting violations under former Coach Larry Brown.

Two members of the team, seniors Milt Newton and Scooter Barry, joined Williams and Athletic Director Bob Frederick at a news conference later. Barry's eyes were red, and Newton, his eyes filled with tears, had to leave the room for several minutes.

The NCAA penalties, Newton said, "hit me like a ton of bricks."

The three years of probation include a prohibition against appearing in the NCAA tournament this season. Other sanctions include a prohibition against paying for recruits' visits to the campus for one year, starting Jan. 1, and the loss of one basketball scholarship.

Williams, who spent the past 10 years as an assistant at North Carolina under Dean Smith, himself a Kansas graduate, is only the seventh basketball coach in the Jayhawks' history. He was named to take over after Brown, who at first almost went back to UCLA, and then joined the pro coaching ranks with the NBA's San Antonio Spurs.

The players, Williams said, are reacting well. On Tuesday night, he took them to Salina for a scrimmage before about 3,000 people.

"It was good for the kids," he said. "A chance to get on the bus, and get away from everybody for a couple of hours."

The coach said there has been strong support from the faculty and student body, and also from fellow coaches. He did not hear from Brown, his predecessor, Williams said.

He said colleagues in the coaching fraternity had been urging him to "keep my head up."

"Everybody feels very confident that we'll get it done," he said. "Everybody is just very encouraging."

Iowa State Coach Johnny Orr said the restriction against bringing recruits in to visit the campus could "be a killer."

"That's difficult," Williams agreed. "But like I said yesterday, there is nothing we can do about it. We're just going to have to work hard."

Although barred from NCAA post-season tournament play, the Jayhawks could be allowed to participate in the Big Eight Conference tournament. A decision on whether to allow them to play will be made by conference officials.

Williams, whose team opens play Nov. 19 by hosting the Soviet national team, said he is pleased with progress so far.

"The guys are working very hard every day," he said. "We're starting to work things in more, and I hope things will start jelling. I know a little more about the personnel than when we started out, so that's helpful."

In San Antonio, Brown acknowledged the NCAA sanctions resulted largely from improper recruiting inducements given to Vincent Askew, who briefly transferred to Kansas from Memphis State in 1986.

Brown said that he, Jerry Collins, formerly in broadcast production at KU and now in a similar role with the Spurs, Ralph Light, president of a Kansas City construction company, and Mike Marshall, a former KU player who worked in Brown's basketball camp in 1986, were responsible for the inducements.

The NCAA report said an unidentified representative of KU's athletic interests paid $183 for an airline ticket for Askew to fly from Memphis to Kansas City.

Brown said that he personally paid $364 for a round-trip ticket so Askew could return to Memphis to visit his sick grandmother, who later died.

"I'd give it to anybody if he told me his grandmother was passing away," Brown said. "It wasn't something I was trying to hide."

Panel discussion examines trends, life in rural America

By The Collegian Staff

The eighth annual Working With Families Conference opened Wednesday with a panel discussion by three K-State professors and the director of Farmers' Assistance, Counseling and Training Service of Manhattan.

The four led a discussion titled "Patterns of Change in Rural America."

Two major trends exist in rural America, said Marc Johnson, professor and head of the Department of Agricultural Economics.

The first trend is a growing in size of farms and a diminishing number of farms because of the increased business risks small farms pose.

The second is "out-migration." Johnson noted that half of a million people move from rural areas to cities each year. As people move out of rural areas, the cost of living in those areas increases.

Rural communities must look to the future for new kinds of rural communities with different community institutions, said Cornelia Flora, professor of sociology, anthropology and social work.

For a community to improve itself, it must first admit it has a problem, Flora said. It must also be willing to invest in itself.

The country is not responsive to the rural crisis, said Anthony Jurich, professor of human development and family studies. The remedies for the rural crisis don't work because the remedies are not made by rural people.

The choices must be made by people who work with families in rural communities, said Stan Ward, director of FACTS.

The workshop is designed to provide skills, knowledge and resources useful to professionals who work with rural families, according to Steve Bollman, director of the Family Center and conference co-director.

The conference, which is also scheduled for today and Friday, will cover topics such as family impact of rural economic changes, rural health care, community development and family financial decision-making.

The main goals of the conference are to help professionals learn more about the human dimension of the rural economic situation, to understand personal and community strengths for coping with change, and to learn to plan.

students want," McIntyre said.

"My campaign is unique because I'm trying to appeal to the whole student body, not to one faction. We must grow as individuals and as a student body," Cuffy said.

Cuffy congratulated McIntyre, at Marlatt Hall and challanged him to a debate, to which McIntyre agreed.

Both candidates said they wanted to debate next week in the Union. The primary debates were held in residence halls and this isolated too many students, they said.

The Union Program Council is sponsoring a debate for the run-off candidates Nov. 6 at 7 p.m. in the Union courtyard, but both candidates feel a daytime debate will draw more students.

"We need to get people who haven't made up their minds at the debates," McIntyre said.

"We really need to get more people to come out and watch," Cuffy said.

K-State's biggest problem is that the student government doesn't have a priority list to deal with University issues, Cuffy said.

"We don't have a process to resolve any issues. That is the major problem facing students."

Cuffy said student government needs to set a priority list for funding and student fee allocations so that money is not just handed out arbitrarily.

The fact that the results didn't come out until almost 11 p.m. didn't bother McIntyre.

"I wasn't nervous because if you are nervous, that just means you feel you didn't do all that you could do," McIntyre said. "I knew there was nothing more that I could do. I was just anxious, everything was up to the voters."

McIntyre also wanted to commend the other presidential candidates.

students and graduate teaching assistants."

However, some departments are already saturated, Harbers said. He said some of the options in architecture and agriculture are full.

Harbers said the program that began this summer has set the Graduate School in a "new direction" and, as the departments reach the saturation point, they can be more selective.

"We were doing a good job of recruiting in the past, without calling it recruiting," O'Neill said.

The Graduate School will be sending out more information and mailing more letters to potential and accepted graduate students, he said. The school is also publishing a color brochure, which is due in December. In addition, a new staff position has been added.

Bobette McGaughey is now in charge of the recruiting efforts for the Graduate School. McGaughey is in the process of meeting with department heads to determine the number of students each department can accomodate. She also is visiting various colleges in Kansas for one-day recruitment stops.

McGaughey said, "We don't want to increase for numbers per se. We want quality students."

In order to be accepted to the Graduate School, a student must have received a baccalaureate degree from a fully accredited institution and have had a 3.0 grade point average. The degree, if received at another institution, must be equivalent to a degree offered at K-State.

The potential graduate student receives a letter of recommendation from the department if the student qualifies academically and has good enough scores on one of the standardized tests given to potential students such as the Graduate Records Exam or the Graduate Management Aptitude Test.

Harbers said the application then goes to the Graduate School. The processing time is slower for international students than for residential students because the background information on the students and the institutions they attended are difficult to check and equate to K-State.

He said six residential students can be processed in the time it takes to process one international student.

Sue Blodgett, president of graduate student council, said the organization tries to promote the Graduate School even though it is not involved in recruiting.

"Raising the visibility of graduate programs with things like the graduate student handbook helps to orient incoming graduate students," Blodgett said. "We think it is important that these students get acquainted with what's going on at KSU."

years ago. Lapping said the increase has created many problems, but stressed that a cap number has not been decided.

Lapping said the faculty-to-student ratio is "out of hand" and the number of students is forcing the college to drop some of its electives in order to sustain required courses.

"We are sacrificing everything just to teach the required courses."

"With the strongest push for Washburn in years . . . Joe Knopp can stand up to the pressure." (Knopp ad, Collegian, Oct. 31)

Joe said he voted for funding Washburn through the Regents because he had to "carry water for the Governor on that issue." (KAPE Forum, Aug. 24)

Steve Priest, junior in architecture, and Cindy Green, sophomore in chemistry, display some of their train engines and finely detailed buildings, which they build as a hobby. Priest has been interested in trains since he was 3 years old. After countless hours of work, an engine will be worth approximately $150.

Romance of railroads captivates couple

By Chris Doll
Features Editor

For most people, the romance of the railroads is a thing of the past. But two K-State students are building their future on them.

So far, they have built more than 50 model train engines, 20 buildings and a miniature stockyard full of railroad cars.

Cindy Green, sophomore in chemistry, and Steve Priest, junior in architecture, who met a year ago, seem to have an average relationship for a couple who plans to marry. They save money to travel together and want to move into a bigger apartment. But they do not have the usual reasons for wanting these things.

When Priest heard the couple could move from their apartment to a Manhattan condominium during Christmas vacation, he drew out a sketch of a 5-foot by 9-foot railroad track configuration, complete with two cities, 70 buildings, five engines and 10 cars.

The two have been on the waiting list for the condominium since August, and could not wait to start building the model railroad, he said.

But before they construct any of the components, they research what they plan to build. Along with building the model, they also want to see every Santa Fe engine ever built. Their search takes them to a stream near Mulvane where they spend lazy afternoons waiting for Santa Fe trains to pass over a bridge. It also lets them chase engines across the state in hopes of meeting an engine they have not yet seen.

"We like to travel so instead of going out or anything else, we go chase trains," Cindy said.

The two know they will never see all the blue and yellow Santa Fe engines. Some are rebuilt and renumbered, other trains do not travel outside one area and others are destroyed in railroad accidents.

Priest would like to model all of his engines after the ones built in 1978. When planning to build a model of an engine, he pays close attention to every detail, from air conditioning to what type of warning lights it has.

Priest said the search "is a loosing battle ..."

"But it is full of adventure," Green said.

Last Christmas break, the couple vacationed in California. Every morning of their seven-day vacation, they started searching for trains at 6 a.m. and kept searching until about 1 a.m.

After every search, they mark off the engines' number in the back of railroad books.

When they see Santa Fe engines built in 1978, they pay close attention because they would like to build most of the Santa Fe models of trains from that year. They try to photograph or videotape the engines to capture the smallest details. It is the details that make models look authentic, Priest said.

They look to see if the engine is air conditioned, what kind of warning light it has, how many fans it has and the color scheme. They even go to the trouble of studying what part of the train has the most dirt.

"We do a lot of research before we draw," Priest said. "We even look at how they get dirty. That's how we make them realistic."

Senate debates deadline

By Kendra Gensemer
Staff Writer

Student Senate, in an attempt to deal with several important issues before its term ends, debated Thursday for more than two hours whether to extend the time the Investment Ad Hoc Committee has to report on the results of its research.

"I hate that we even have to debate this bill," said Bernie Giefer, graduate senator and Senate representative for the committee.

The purpose of the committee is to determine into what companies student monies are invested, and if those companies do business in or with South Africa.

"It's a result of piss-poor organization of the committee," Giefer said.

The possiblity of partisan opinion entering into a decision whether to withdraw monies invested in companies doing business in South Africa raised much concern among senators.

Arts and Sciences Sen. Cindy Riemann said she thinks the committee needed more time to do research to provide the necessary information for Senate to base any decision it may make on divestment.

Originally required to report to Senate Nov. 10, the committee requested an extension until Feb. 2.

Senate approved a proposal by Giefer for a report to be made by Nov. 17, the last meeting of this year's Senate, giving the committee two weeks to complete its report.

Giefer said the committee sent a letter to the KSU Foundation Oct. 28 asking it to name the companies in which student monies are invested.

The committee expects to receive that information today, Giefer said.

In other business, Senate approved a revision to the Student Government Bylaws establishing guidelines for interpretation of the Constitution by Student Tribunal.

Previously there have not been guidelines for interpretation.

Tribunal is required to make interpretations upon written request by the student body president or chairperson of Student Senate or by presentation of a petition signed by 50 students.

Senate also heard first reading of a bill to allocate $3,000 to K-State Crew for a downpayment on a new boat.

"We can't really come up with the money ourselves," said Eric Custer, junior in political science and Crew president.

Crew has raised almost $3,500 to contribute to the boat's cost of $12,000.

Senate also heard first reading on a resolution for consideration of the athletic fee by the new Senate.

Ticket sale ends 3rd campout

By Kevin Kramer
Collegian Reporter

The tents have come and gone for a third time this year at Ahearn Field House — this time, in less than 24 hours.

Camping out to purchase student basketball tickets for the season opener against Purdue University began at 10:30 p.m. Wednesday and ended Thursday evening with the sale of the first 14 front-row tickets to Troy Wedel, junior in agricultural economics, and Stan Kroeker, senior in nuclear engineering.

"We were even asked if we wanted front-row seats," Kroeker said. "The lady in the ticket office seemed amazed that we wanted front-row seats."

"We decided it was well worth spending the night to get front-row seats," Wedel said. "We were very surprised there were not more people in line last night."

Carol Adolph, manager of K-State Athletic Ticket Office, reported that 1,259 student tickets for the K-State-Purdue game were sold during the two-hour period, 6 to 8 p.m., Thursday.

Adolph said there are still student tickets remaining for the game, and they can be purchased during regular ticket office hours.

The atmosphere prior to ticket sales was less festive than the two previous campouts. The issue of camping out for tickets was on the minds of many of the students in line.

"There needs to be a new system for the purchase of season tickets," said Greg Zabel, senior in general business. "The administration should examine other schools' procedures for ticket sales.

"What keeps fans from camping out from the first day of school?" he said. "It appears as if K-State students have the wrong priority about academics."

Campus to aid food drive

By Kevin Kramer
Collegian Reporter

Operation Turkey. Sounds like a military exercise designed to rescue turkeys held captive for Thanksgiving dinners.

Actually, it is a week-long, food-drive competition to benefit the Flint Hills Breadbasket Thanksgiving Holiday Food Program.

During Nov. 7-12 Operation Turkey, sponsored by the Order of Omega, will collect food donations throughout Manhattan, said Lisa Tarvestad, senior in industrial engineering and president of the group.

The food collected will be used for food baskets to be distributed at Thanksgiving in Manhattan, said Atina Hanna, director of the Flint Hills Breadbasket.

"We couldn't provide Thanksgiving food baskets without the help of Operation Turkey," she said. "Almost all the food and money needed to purchase meat for the 700 baskets needed for this year's program will come from the students' efforts with this project."

This is the fourth year the Order of Omega has sponsored the project, Tarvestad said.

"Each year the project expands to include more people and increased donations for the Flint Hills Breadbasket," he said.

Order of Omega is a greek honorary organization based on scholastic achievement and campus, chapter, and community involvement.

Next year, Tarvestad said, the group hopes to expand Operation Turkey by involving a larger number of living groups at K-State.

"We would like to make it a campuswide project to assist the community with food baskets at Thanksgiving," she said.

Operation Turkey consists of two projects, Miss-A-Meal and the communitywide food drive competition, Tarvestad said.

"Each of the 21 fraternities and 12 sororities at K-State are involved in Miss-A-Meal," she said. "Money

2 people dead in shoot out

MEXICO CITY — At least two people were killed and 15 wounded in a shootout late Thursday between rival labor factions inside a Mexico City luxury hotel, news reports said.

The private Televisa newscast "24 Hours" said about 200 dissident labor activists stormed the Hotel Presidente Chapultepec and began firing at members of the pro-government Mexican Workers Federation.

Televisa said the shootout lasted about a half-hour before police arrived and began arresting labor unionists. The report said about 200 people were arrested.

An undetermined number of gunmen were still inside the hotel Thursday night, the report said, adding that police had surrounded the site.

It was not immediately known if any foreigners were among the casualties.

Television pictures showed the lobby of the hotel completely destroyed.

Televisa said the unionists belonged to the workers federation and began the melee against employees of the hotel.

Soviets nostalgic for Reagan

MOSCOW — The Soviets have a clear favorite in next week's U.S. presidential election. Unfortunately for them, his name is Ronald Reagan, and the Constitution won't let him run again.

As George Bush and Michael Dukakis make their last campaign swings before Tuesday's election, Soviets are waxing nostalgic about the outgoing eight-year tenant in the White House who once called their country an "evil empire" and joked about bombing it into oblivion.

They are also looking ahead to a Bush victory, although without apparent relish.

"To be quite frank, I can't say I've personally been carried away by the statements of either Bush or Dukakis when they spoke of Soviet-American relations," Nikolai V. Shishlin, a spokesman for the Communist Party Central Committee, told a news briefing Thursday.

Reagan, once caricatured by the party daily Pravda as a missile-toting cowboy, now is portrayed as a reliable bargaining partner who sat down with President Mikhail S. Gorbachev and negotiated a nuclear missile treaty and instigated negotiations in Geneva for a 50 percent cut in strategic arms.

Korean students, police clash

SEOUL, South Korea — Thousands of students demanding the arrest of former President Chun Doo-hwan clashed with riot police Thursday in one of the worst street protests in recent months.

President Roh Tae-woo, on an overseas trip, said he was not troubled and hoped political turmoil in his country would end "in the not-too-distant future."

"I am not much worried about the student protests. Their complaints will eventually disappear in a huge melting furnace of democratic political reforms," Roh told reporters aboard a plane which took him to Malaysia, Australia, Indonesia and Brunei.

Police said more than 20,000 students from 80 colleges took part in anti-Chun campus rallies or street protests in Seoul and a dozen provincial cities on Thursday, national students' day. They accused the former president of corruption and violating human rights.

About 50 students were arrested, mostly in Seoul, said police. They gave no injury figures, but said some youths and policemen suffered cuts and burns.

Koop against AIDS measure

SAN FRANCISCO — A California ballot measure that would force doctors and blood banks to report positive AIDS-test results would discourage people from participating in research, U.S. Surgeon General C. Everett Koop said.

"It would drive people who could participate in drug trials away from research and underground," Koop said. "Everything we have done may step backwards five years."

Proposition 102 is "contrary to every principle of public health I know," Koop said in Wednesday's San Francisco Examiner.

The proposition will be on the ballot Tuesday along with a measure, Proposition 96, that would allow judges to order AIDS tests for people accused of sex crimes.

In a poll of 600 registered California voters, 41 percent favored Proposition 102, 28 percent opposed it and 31 percent were undecided, the newspaper said.

Proposition 96 was favored by 47 percent and opposed by 28 percent, with 25 percent undecided. The margin of error was four percentage points.

KU receives television grant

LAWRENCE — The producers of the television show "Sesame Street" will pay $1.2 million to the University of Kansas to study the effect television has on low-income children.

The Children's Television Workshop, based in New York, has approved a contract with KU for a seven-year study of disadvantaged children ages 2 to 7 years.

Aletha Huston, a professor of human development who helped found KU's Center for Research on the Influences of Television on Children, said about 300 to 400 children from the Kansas City area would be studied.

"They want to know what children get out of the programs they watch," Huston said. "They want to know what leads children to watch their programs."

The Children's Television Workshop developed "Sesame Street" in 1969, and also produces educational programs such as "3-2-1 Contact" and "Square One TV."

Some money for the study will come from the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation in Chicago.

Revenue in general fund up

TOPEKA — A spokesman said Thursday Gov. Mike Hayden welcomed news that revenue flowing into the state general fund continues to exceed expectations, because it keeps the state in a strong position to deal with money issues facing the 1989 legislative session.

"It's certainly encouraging as we look ahead to the next session, and will certainly aid our effort to look at ways to further cut taxes, fund education and meet other demands facing state government," said Kathy Peterson, Hayden's press secretary.

Peterson commented after the Legislative Budget Committee was told Thursday that state revenue increased by $11 million more than estimated in October, pushing the treasury balance $50.5 million ahead of projections for the first four months of the current fiscal year.

That is the largest treasury cushion the state has ever enjoyed after four months of a fiscal year.

Stock dog training to be given

A stock dog clinic will be sponsored by K-State Block and Bridle and the Kansas Stock Dog Association Saturday and Sunday in Weber Arena.

Instructor Bill Berhow will teach stock dog owners and spectators how to better train their dogs. Training will include learning to bring in cattle or other livestock, with some livestock in the arena for the session.

Attendance is open to the public and fees are $40 per dog or $5 per spectator.

Campus watering intensified due to low area rainfall levels

By Kathy Winklhofer
Collegian Reporter

If you feel a cold shower from a water sprinkler while walking to class in the next couple of weeks, it is probably because maintenance ground crews are attempting to get an intense watering completed before the first freeze.

The grounds maintenance crews are continuing to water the lawns now because of the lack of rainfall this year. A normal rainfall figure for this time of the year is about 30.5 inches. Currently Manhattan has only received 18.9 inches of rain, said Tom G. Lee, facility grounds maintenance manager and physical plant supervisor II.

"We are making a desperate attempt to water the grass now, before winter hits," Lee said. The lawns must have sufficient moisture before the first freeze hits, he said.

Ground crews have been re-seeding or re-sodding plots of land that do not appear healthy. Re-seeding is done more often because re-sodding is very expensive and takes a lot of labor, Lee said.

The grounds crews use sprinkler systems for the large plots of land. Sprinkler systems are used on the lawns of the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, the Memorial Stadium and practice field, the Bramlage Coliseum, around Durland Hall, Throckmorton Hall, Dykstra Hall, Umberger Hall, Call Hall, Weber Hall, Bluemont Hall, Chemistry/Biochemistry Building, around the parking lot between Holton Hall and the Art Building and in front of Anderson Hall.

Tax ruling benefits greeks

By Mary Gomez
Collegian Reporter

Fraternities and sororities across the nation can now add educational wings onto their houses and have donations for the addition be tax-deductible for the donor.

Five years ago, donating money to greek houses for the funding of additions was not considered tax-deductible, said Vern Claussen, member of the FarmHouse Alumni Association Board.

FarmHouse recently completed the addition of an educational wing. The idea for the addition came from members of the FarmHouse Alumni Association Board in 1983, said Kent Moore, president of FarmHouse.

"We were going to start a fund drive, but the IRS decided that the addition would not be considered an educational project, so it wouldn't be tax deductible, so we put the idea on hold," Claussen said.

"We went to the International Fraternity Council and decided to hire two attorneys to go to the IRS and ask them to reconsider the decision," he said.

After three years of discussing it with the IRS, the ruling was changed, Claussen said. The new ruling said that if the addition was an "educational wing," the donations could be tax-deductible.

FarmHouse then started its fund drive. Claussen said 50 percent of the FarmHouse alumni made donations.

"The wing is done and totally paid for," he said. "It cost approximately $78,000, and all of the money came from donors."

The addition to the house was named the Reitz Educational Wing, after Russell and Helen Reitz, who helped fund the wing. Claussen said that the new educational wing has a computer room, conference room and a library.

"The computer room has four computers, a couple of which were donated also, and the library is a study area for the actives in the house," he said.

FarmHouse is the only greek house at K-State to have added an educational wing onto its house since the new ruling by the IRS.

Family conference focuses on changes

By Melissa Paul
Collegian Reporter

Featured speaker of the 1988 Ruth Hoeflin Forum on Family Issues spoke to educators, health care providers and others concerning "Coping with Change Successfully" Thursday in Union Forum Hall.

The forum, working in conjunction with the eighth annual Working with Families Conference, featured David Olson, professor of family studies at the University of Minnesota and president-elect of the National Council on Family Relations.

The forum was established to honor Hoeflin's contribution to the College of Home Economics during her tenure as dean.

Olson said the annual conference is important because it bridges resources and theory and tries to apply them in a practical way.

He focused on stress and the changes it creates in the family environment. There is a dynamic relationship between stress and change — stress creates an opportunity for change, Olson said.

"It's really a double-edged sword," he said. "Families can create stress, but they can help you cope."

The idea is to minimize the level of stress, Olson said.

"If you have too much (stress), it's problematic. If you don't have enough, that's not good either," he said.

A study conducted of 1,000 families, one-third of which were rural and farm families, showed the state of the families in different stages of the life cycle, Olson said.

The study measured the amount of stressors, single stressful events; the amount of strains, on-going tensions that tend to be more harmful; and the amount of satisfaction the people experienced in each stage.

The results showed that the first stage, young couples, and the second stage, older families with their children gone, had a moderate amount of stressers, low strains and a lot of satisfaction.

Stage three, families with young children, and stage four, families with adolescent children, had high strains and low levels of satisfaction.

The family that denies and avoids stress, which is caused by financial problems, work problems or any number of things, becomes passive, so the situation remains, he said.

Debaters pursue national ranking

By The Collegian Staff

Happy days are here again for the K-State debaters, who may achieve national ranking for the second year in a row.

Ed Schiappa, head debate coach, estimated the 1988-89 squad will finish as one of the top five debate squads in the nation. The 1987-88 squad was ranked fifth out of about 400 colleges.

"The national rankings are not an opinion poll. They are based on how well you do in the tournaments," Schiappa said.

Final rankings are awarded in April, immediately after the national tournament, said Mary Keehner, assistant debate coach. Since the beginning of September, the squad has competed in eight tournaments and placed in all of them.

"The squad is very deep this year," Schiappa said. "We don't have just one or two stand-outs."

Four teams, consisting of two people each, competed in a tournament at Emory University in Atlanta, Ga., over the weekend, and all four teams placed, he said.

"The team is doing pretty well. We are competitive with some of the top schools in the nation," said Rich McCollum, sophomore in speech and philosophy, who finished seventh out of more than 100 speakers at the tournament.

The team of McCollum and David Filippi, sophomore in economics, placed fifth out of 55 teams. Keehner said the fact that all four teams made it to the elimination rounds proved K-State is a national contender.

"Our placings at the (Emory) tournament were really important because it draws the best teams out of the country," she said, adding that only 16 teams made it to the elimination round.

"And when we've got 25 percent of the teams in the elimination round, it means our squad has a lot of depth to it," Keehner said.

Schiappa said he has outlined three goals for the team this year: to do as well as or better than last year's national ranking of fifth, to once again be named Junior Varsity National Champions, and to place all four teams who compete at the national tournament.

Because of the size of the tournament, colleges are restricted to entering four teams, Keehner said.

"Our team is very capable of placing at nationals, but it will be tough," Schiappa said.

Last year, the squad placed two teams at nationals, he said.

There are 10 to 12 two-person teams on the squad.

"We put people together who think in a complementary fashion," he said.

To round out the semester, the squad will compete at Central State in Oklahoma and the Wichita State University, Keehner said.

Columnist gains insight, gets second chance

Commentary

KARLA REDELSHEIMER
Collegian Columnist

Going to the third biennial Dwight D. Eisenhower lecture Oct. 24 was a new experience — I did it on a whim. It was kind of a fast-food attempt to "broaden my horizons" on the Nixon era.

Stephen Ambrose, professor at the University of New Orleans, author of books and television documentaries, and former Dwight D. Eisenhower professor of war and peace at our beloved K-State had returned to Manhattan to speak on Vietnam.

The large crowd came close to filling Forum Hall and were eager to hear Ambrose's presentation "Nixon and Vietnam: Vietnam in Electoral Politics."

A man was setting up a videotape camera and a few others had tape recorders. A photographer with a huge zoom lense edged his way up to the front of the theater to get pictures of Ambrose in action. Faculty members were sprinkled throughout the audience along with students armed with note pads and sharp pencils ready to scratch quotes and main points of Ambrose's speech. The head of the Department of History was on stage right next to President Jon Wefald — this was IMPORTANT!

Ambrose took out his paper and started reading. I couldn't concentrate — I got caught up in the atmosphere. It wasn't lack of delivery — Ambrose has a scratchy, intellectual tone quality, he punctuated his speech with perfectly-timed inflections. I knew it wasn't lack of substance because my friend kept nudging me and saying, "This is really interesting. I never knew that happened."

What was I doing? A famous historian and author was standing 15 yards away from me and I couldn't focus my attention on his speech for longer than two minutes. A once-in-a-lifetime event was within my grasp and I was too zoned-out to listen to it.

I came back to reality just in time to catch the question and answer session. Afterall, people who raise questions are intelligent and have long attention spans. The Q. and A. did for me, what a test-review session does for a student who has blown off the whole semester. It hit on the gist of what Ambrose said, and I would now have something to tell people if they asked me about the speech.

I couldn't do it. When one of my more politically-aware friends asked me how I liked Ambrose's speech, the pressure was too much — I sadly admitted to hearing and understanding only a small fraction of Ambrose's presentation.

But I must have had a good horoscope that day, because I got what most people rarely ever get — a second chance. The very next day Ambrose was taking part in a panel discussion about Nixon's Landon Lecture in 1970 — the very lecture that led to Ambrose's resignation.

Panel members consisted of Ambrose, Joseph Hajda, former chaiman of the Landon Lecture series, William Stamey, former dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, John McCulloh, professor of history and John Biggs, who attended the lecture as a K-State student.

There weren't any video cameras or photographers, just people who came to listen, reminisce, and in my case, learn how Nixon took K-State for what it was famous for — Midwestern hospitality.

A segment of Nixon's speech was shown at the start of the discussion. Nixon was wearing a purple and white tie as he spouted with talk of purple pride and coaxed the audience "to stand up and be heard" (stand up and applaud — otherwise known as an ovation).

He called K-State one of the nation's finest universities (applause) and spoke of losers coming back as winners. Nixon implied that he, just as our football team with its history of losses, was coming back to be triumphant.

The men on the panel described the lecture as having the atmosphere of a high school pep rally. The K-State pep band and cheerleaders performed before the lecture, and revved-up the crowd with school fight songs and cheers. The crowd was injected with hype and was easily manipulated to yell and cheer for anything that captured its excitement. K-State made a trade with Nixon — Kansas' politeness for the honor of having a president visit its campus.

Unfortunately, Nixon's tactics were not and are not unique. It was scary to see and hear how easily the large audience was coerced to cheer for him. What scared me the most was that I could see how easy it would have been to join in with the cheering and clapping of the crowd.

The discussion left me with mixed feelings. I was angry at how K-State had been used to start Nixon's campaign off in a positive light, yet felt privileged to get my second chance. The men who took part in the panel discussion, as well as contributing members of the audience, gave me a history lesson out of K-State's past that will be hard to forget.

K-State can be proud of its marching band

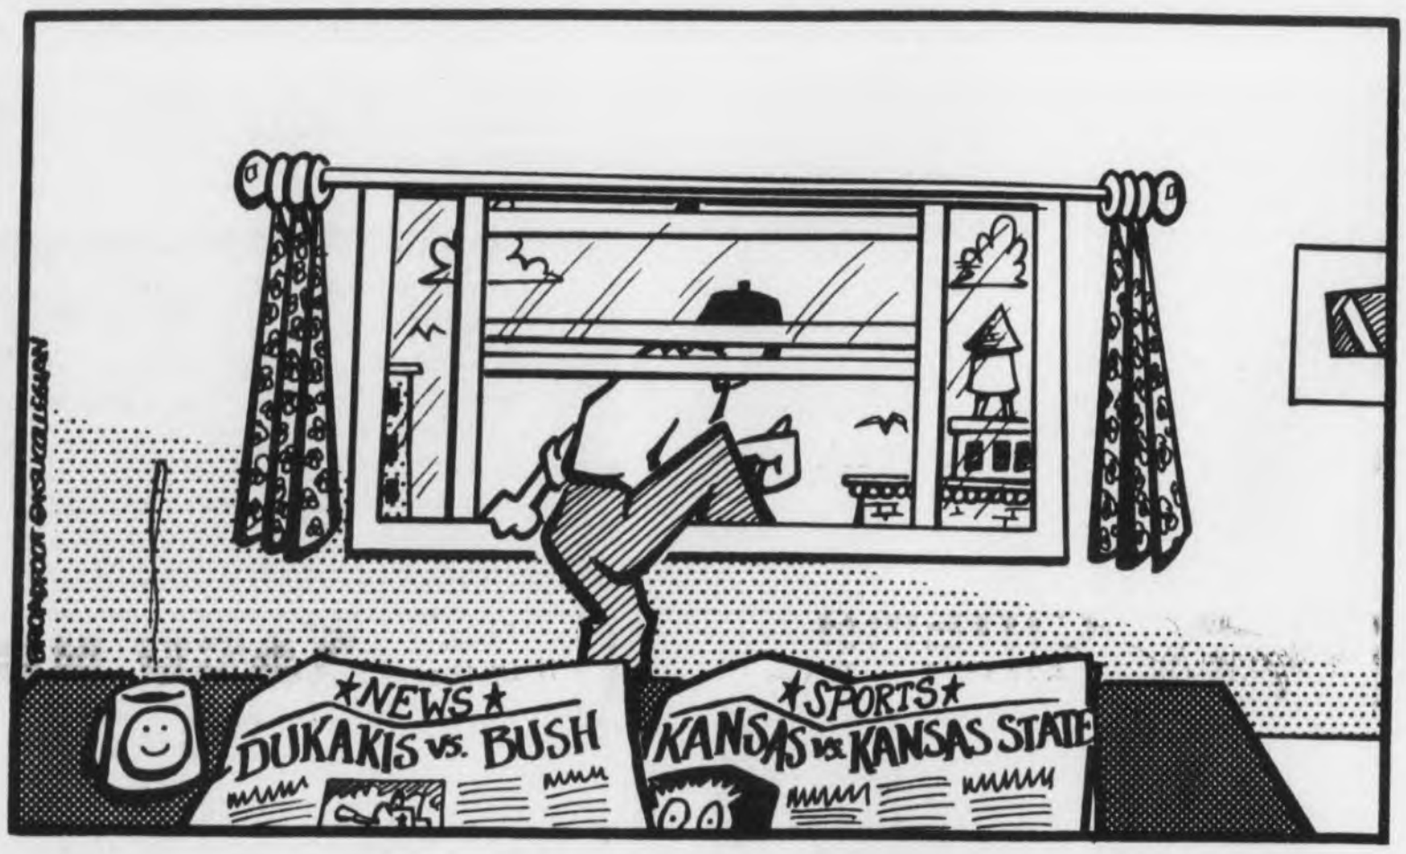
Strike up the band.

Each year, despite the lackluster performance of the football team, we can count on the marching band to brighten the afternoons at KSU Stadium.

The 'PRIDE of Wildcat Land' Marching Band has a devoted commitment to K-State, the football program and the University. Such annual events as Band Day and the Central States Marching Festival bring thousands of high school students to campus. In the spring semester, the band travels to more than 30 area high schools recruiting musicians.

This year, the band is composed of more than 200 students representing many parts of the University. The group has significant student leadership and responds positively and enthusiastically to requests by the athletic department, the student body and the Manhattan community.

Band members devote countless hours to something they really love and consider important to K-State's tradition.



It's a given that the band will be at pep rallies, bonfires, Homecoming activities, alumni events, basketball showcases and the football games. And band members don't leave the stadium during the third or fourth quarters as do many of the game attendees.

But think for a minute what your reaction would be if the familiar "Wildcat Victory" or "Wabash Cannonball" wasn't booming from the stands during the kickoff.

The K-State band runs on a shoestring budget and faces an ominous problem of trying to solicit funds to replace aging uniforms. Yet it continues to generate enthusiasm, spirit and fun at even the most dismal athletic events.

As the band travels to the 'Cats game at Lawrence this weekend and to a Kansas City Chiefs game at Arrowhead Stadium next weekend, it will represent K-State in the proudest sense of the word.

Thank you band, for being ambassadors of the student body and for making Saturday afternoons, and the entire football season, a little more enjoyable.

Editorial wrong

Editor,

Your editorial of Oct. 19 makes five assertions about the Tawana Brawley case, each of which is ill-conceived.

You compare her assertion that she was raped to the Salem witch trials in which the men in control of that society killed women that they feared, and chose which women to kill on the basis of assertions by children that these women were witches. But Tawana Brawley is a 15-year-old female who has accused some of the men in control of this sociey of raping her, and other men in control of this society have dismissed her allegations. The only similarity between these cases is the systematic oppression of women by men.

You state that her case was ruined by her advisers who have made "unsubstantiated comments" and advised her not to testify. While the portrayals of these men in the press have not been flattering, the dominant "white" society must not dismiss the charges by Brawley and her advisers, who are "black," that the system of justice is biased simply because we do not like the messengers. Their charges are certainly plausible since "the system" appointed a "white" prosecutor who has had no experience in prosecuting rape cases and chose a grand jury that was 92 percent "white."

You state that after an "extensive" investigation, the grand jury could find no evidence that Brawley had been raped, and at the same time you say that this jury did not have the testimony of a key witness, Tawana Brawley. An incomplete investigation by a rookie can hardly be called "extensive." It would be more accurately labeled an "unsubstantiated comment."

You accuse Brawley's advisers of "height-en(ing) racial tension." This statement is a thinly clad euphemism for "uppity blacks are the cause of racism in whites." In fact, if "whites" would shed our racism, there would be no racial tension. Furthermore, "blacks" do "whites" a service by making comments that make us uncomfortable. Our discomfort may be used as a guide to finding where we are still stuck in racist beliefs.

Finally, you say that the "victim of this episode ... (is) the American people." This is outrageous obfuscation. Certainly survivors of rape may be less believed as a result of this case and American people of color may experience more racism. But on the scale of the systematic humiliation, degradation and mutilation that women of African descent have been put through by the Euro-American men who held them in bondage and continue to be put through by their "white" descendants, show me a "white" American male who has been "a victim of this episode."

End the campout

Editor,

How much time is wasted by students that are camping out for basketball tickets? I can answer that myself — a lot! I think that a major university like K-State can come up with a much more productive way of distributing student season basketball tickets. How about a lottery system or an all-sports ticket? It works at KU so why can't it work here? I think it's time for a change.

Help stop racism

Editor,

I am appalled. Thursday morning as I sat enjoying my breakfast in the Union Staterоom, I heard something from across the room I couldn't believe.

The Collegian's front page story Thursday announced the student body presidential election results. John McIntyre, senior in industrial engineering, and Laurian Cuffy, senior in management, will face off next week in a run-off election. Five "gentlemen" across the room began to discuss this event in wonderment.

"Did you see this?" they cried out. "This Cuffy dude is black! What's he going to do as president?" The five then launched into a racist "rap" song as they left the room.

What happened after they left the room was just as upsetting. People at surrounding tables sat and laughed at what was happening.

Was I the only one angry about this behavior? How can we allow this undercurrent of racism to continue on our campus? I was naive thinking we had left most of this behind years ago.

What can you — the little man — do? STOP LAUGHING! You're only encouraging their behavior. Look over at these people and tell them this behavior has no place at K-State. The men who did this are guilty, but those of you who sat there encouraging them are equally guilty.

Renee Shephard
graduate student in business administration

Knopp not so bad

Editor,

Knopp-knocking seems to be popular on this campus nowadays. Therefore, being an old non-conformist of many years, I would like to put in a few unsolicited good words concerning my friend and former student.

Joe Knopp has served K-State well during the past eight years as our local state representative. Not only did he quickly learn the ropes in Topeka, but he has become an established force in Kansas politics — much to the benefit of Manhattan and K-State. I know from first-hand reports that Joe is highly respected by his colleagues and is seen as a person who can get things done. It would be shortsighted and counterproductive to lose him as our state representative. Not only that, but Joe is of the Eisenhower-Landon-Carlson mold — that is, he stands in the finest, progressive tradition of the Kansas Republican Party.

Now, I realize that Joe isn't perfect. As I repeatedly tell my students, there are no perfect human beings, churches or politicians. However, Joe can't be as bad as his opponents depict him because, like Michael Dukakis, he is often seen playing a little catch in his spare minutes. (However, I would hasten to add that Joe seldom rides tanks!)

Architects to dress up for annual arts ball

By Brenda Birt
Collegian Reporter

If you see a six-foot Empire State Building walking toward you this weekend in Aggieville, don't be alarmed. Saturday night is the sixth annual Beaux Arts Ball, a party sponsored by the American Institute of Architecture Students.

At the Beaux Arts Ball, students and faculty members dress formally or in costume.

"People sometimes come as their favorite building or architectural detail, like a column," said Michael Barolak, senior in interior architecture and chairman of the Beaux Arts committee.

"The party is a tribute to the students of the Ecole des Beaux Arts."
—Michael Barolak chairman

"I've seen the Parthenon, the Chrysler Building, the Sears Tower, the John Hancock Building and the Empire State Building at parties before," he said.

The Beaux Arts theme is always architectural, and this year's theme is Mosque of the Red Death: A Tribute to Funerary Architecture.

As a play upon Edgar Allen Poe's short story,"Masque of the Red Death," the committee brought in the theme of funerary architecture by superimposing an 'o' around the 'a' in 'masque.' The symbol replacing the 'a' stands for anarchy and allows the word to be pronounced 'mosque,' Barolak said.

"The concept behind this year's theme is a post-Halloween party which ultimately leads into the funerary architecture theme," Barolak said.

Past themes have included Myth of Palatial Urbanism and Monumental Formalism.

Architectural themes are a large part of Beaux Arts because they are part of its history, Barolak said. In the early 20th century, a tradition from the Ecole des Beaux Arts in Paris moved to the United States. The students used to throw a party upon the completion of each project, and the idea moved to America.

"The party is a tribute to the students of the Ecole des Beaux Arts," Barolak said.

Architecture schools across the country also hold Beaux Arts Balls to celebrate the history.

"K-State is really known for their Beaux Arts," Barolak said. "We send invitations to the University of Nebraska, University of Kansas, University of Iowa, and the Kansas City Art Institute."

The party is an opportunity for students to appreciate their field and to have fun, he said.

"When we're sitting in studio, we're so pushed for time and deadlines that Beaux Arts is always something we look forward to. It's the major architecture event of the year," Barolak said.

"It's a good time because all five years and all three departments in the college interact," said Tim Miles, fifth-year senior in architecture and business. "It's one of the things we all do together."

Austrailian orchestra to perform

By Heather Huntington
Collegian Reporter

For the first time in its history, the Australian Sydney Symphony Orchestra is touring the United States and will wind up its tour with a performance in McCain Auditorium Sunday at 7:30 p.m.

The 96-member orchestra, under the the direction of Chief Conductor Stuart Challender, has selected Australian composer Carl Vine's Symphony No. 2 to begin the performance.

Vine said his music is complex in harmony and tone without being difficult for the listener to follow.

"The duty of the composer today is to grip his audience," Vine said. "I believe you must capture the audience's ear. If I don't do that, then I haven't done my job as composer."

Classical music listeners should look for the same things that they do in other forms of music, he said.

"This type of music is as complex as anything you can hear on a pop radio station," he said.

"The orchestra is kind of an undiscovered gem," said Richard Martin, director of McCain Auditorium. "And this is an orchestra that is on the verge of breaking into a world class league."

Although most Americans don't envision college students as classical music lovers, college-age people in the United States listen to and appreciate classical music more than those in Australia, Vine said.

"The standard of classical music is lower (in Australia) than in the states," he said. "Musical education at the high school level in the United States is much higher than in Australia."

Although Vine's works have already been performed in Las Vegas and Los Angeles on this tour, he says he looks forward to having them performed in smaller towns such as Manhattan.

"Frequently the smaller towns are more affected. People welcome an event such as this," he said.

In addition to Vine's works, works written by Camille Saint-Saens and Igor Stravinsky will also be performed, said Martin.

Stravinsky's work "Petrushka" will be performed in its original version.

In addition, the program will feature romantic style pianist Shura Cherkassky.

"(The show) is giving us a chance to hear someone's romantic style," Martin said. "Romantics show an attitude to works that is very obvious and easy to hear."

Legislative candidates increase spending

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Candidates for legislative seats appear to be spending more on their campaigns this year than they have in past years.

Several candidates in hotly contested Senate races raised and spent more than $25,000 between the end of July and the end of October, and a few spent more than $30,000, campaign finance reports due in the secretary of state's office this week showed.

In hotly contested House races, a few candidates raised and spent more than $10,000 during the same period. In one Johnson County race, the incumbent has spent more than $25,000 in trying to keep her seat.

Also, the state Republican and Democratic parties and political action committees affiliated with them continue to raise and spend large amounts of money. Democrats outspent Republicans during the three months the reports cover.

"The spending is high, period, this year," said Carol Williams, executive director of the Kansas Public Disclosure Commission, which enforces ethics and campaign finance laws. "It's just amazing the amount of money going into these campaigns."

Under Kansas law, reports on spending and fundraising activity between July 24 and Oct. 29 had to be mailed to the state by Wednesday. The secretary of state's office, which keeps the records, is still processing some reports.

Williams said her agency plans to mail failure-to-file notices to candidates Friday morning. Candidates will have five days after they receive the notices to file their reports. If they do not file within 15 days after the agency sends out the notices, they can be fined $10 a day.

In 1986, House candidates raised an average of about $7,500 during the entire election campaign, Williams said. In 1984, the last time Senate elections were held, the average Senate candidate raised $15,381 during the entire campaign, she said.

"Their ability to raise money has increased," Williams said, adding that political action committees are giving more money.

In the Senate races, Republican Dave Crockett of Wichita raised $37,800 and spent $31,413 in his attempt to unseat Sen. Norma Daniels, D-Valley Center. Daniels, who had a fund of $12,232.76, raised another $16,332.35 and spent $17,852.76.

Sen. Joe Norvell, D-Hays, has spent $33,502.04 in fending off a stiff challenge from Jerry Moran, R-Hays, who spent $30,791.38.

In the race to replace retiring Sen. Merrill Werts, R-Junction City, Republican Lana Oleen of Manhattan spent $28,467.30. Her opponent, Democrat Rod Olsen of Manhattan, spent $24,941.88.

In the House, Rep. Carol Sader, D-Prairie Village, spent $26,700.69 to fend off a challenge from former Rep. Bruce Mayfield, R-Overland Park. Mayfield spent less than one fifth of that, $4,995.30.

Also, House Majority Leader Joe Knopp, R-Manhattan, spent $14,501.06 in an attempt to fend off what Democrats consider a strong challenge. Knopp's opponent, Sheila Hochhauser of Manhattan, spent $7,253.76.

Suit yields false evidence

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A documents expert testified Thursday that an important piece of evidence introduced by attorneys for Marcia Tomson Stingley, who is suing Attorney General Robert T. Stephan for breach of contract, is fabricated.

Louise Marvin of Topeka said a photocopy of 240 $100 bills in eight stacks is not authentic. Marvin testified that a close examination of the photocopy shows the same bills were used in more than one stack.

Attorneys for Stingley introduced the photocopy as evidence that Stephan paid the former file clerk $24,000 in cash to settle an earlier sexual harassment suit and that he knew of the settlement.

Marvin said that between $3,000 and $10,000, or between 30 and 100 bills, were used to make the photocopy — not 240 bills.

The present suit stems from the earlier sexual harassment suit, filed in on Dec. 24, 1982, shortly after Stingley was fired from her job at the attorney general's office. That suit was settled out of court, although Stephan contends he did not know terms of the settlement until shortly before an Oct. 29, 1985 news conference when terms were revealed.

She is suing Stephan for $5.2 million for breach of contract and for placing her in a "false light" before the public because of that news conference. She and others have testified that settlement terms were to be kept confidential.

She also filed suit against former state Sen. Bob Storey of Topeka for allegedly placing her in a false light at the news conference.

Stingley's attorneys contend Stephan attended a meeting on March 7, 1985, when terms were agreed upon, and another on March 8 when the $24,000 was delivered and the photocopy made. Stephan has denied attending either meeting.

Former Gov. Bob Bennett told the jury that Stephan originally insisted he could not release the terms of the settlement.

Bennett, a Republican who served as governor from 1975 to 1979, said he was a member of Stephan's "sounding board" in preparation for a run at the governorship.

Bennett said he, former Republican State Chairman Jack Ranson and Doug Bailey, a political consultant from Washington, D.C., urged Stephan to announce the settlement terms and put an end to the speculation in the press about the case.

"The attorney general and I had some relatively harsh words about disclosure," Bennett said of one discussion, before the news conference. "He wasn't going to break his word."

Bennett said he later sent Stephan a letter detailing what his political opponents could do legally to obtain information about the settlement and how they could use it politically against him.

"There were other people beside the attorney general who wanted to be governor," Bennett said.

Bennett said he was present when Stephan went over the text of his statement for the news conference, no earlier than the day before it occurred.

"He was incredulous," Bennett said. "He sat there, and he looked at it and, quite frankly, talked to himself for a while. He said 'I didn't know. I didn't know.'"

Others, however, including former Attorney General Vern Miller and Topeka attorney Margie Phelps have testified that Stephan not only knew the terms, but negotiated them. Miller represented Stephan and Phelps represented Stingley in the first suit.

Fred Thompson of Nashville, Stingley's lead attorney, attacked the theory that Stephan is the victim of a conspiracy to ruin his political career.

Thompson said during cross examination of the attorney general that Stephan would have thwarted the alleged conspiracy had he not held the news conference.

Stephan said Miller, who had been his best friend, conspired with Stingley and with at least three members of the Phelps family of lawyers in Topeka. He identified those three attorneys as Margie Phelps, Fred Phelps Sr. and Shirley Phelps-Roper.

Bush denies 'racism' charge; Dukakis claims added support

By The Associated Press

Michael Dukakis asserted Thursday that voters by the millions are giving his underdog campaign "a very strong second look" in the waning days of the race for the White House. George Bush said Democrats were "grossly unfair" to say his advertising is tinged with racism.

"You're looking at a man who was out front for civil rights and I will be again," the vice president said in a network television interview. He defended running mate Dan Quayle on the same score and said any political wounds would heal quickly after the election.

Dukakis combined an attack on the Reagan-Bush administration's record on drugs with ritual declarations that the political tide was turning in his favor. "His administration has cut deals with foreign drug runners. I'm going to cut aid" to their nations, said the Democratic nominee.

Most of the national attention was on the White House campaign, but not all.

Democrats were expressing confidence they would control both houses of the new Congress, although Republicans said they had a chance of picking up a seat or two in the Senate. A dozen gubernatorial contests dotted ballots being printed for next Tuesday's Election Day.

The public opinion polls in the White House campaign continued to provide encouragement for Bush.

Dukakis was trying desperately to reverse poll deficits in several large Electoral College battlegrounds at once. He ventured unexpectedly into New Jersey, crooning a la Bruce Springsteen, "I was born to run and born to win." But Bush, Reagan, Quayle and Co. were pouring it on in Ohio, where private polls continued to show a solid Republican edge.

ABC said its survey of North Carolina — once Dukakis' strongest hope for a Southern success — gave the vice president an 11-point edge. Dukakis held a four-point margin in a New York survey.

Bush and Dukakis were spending millions on campaign-closing television and radio commercials, and both the Democratic and Republican parties previewed a spate of advertisements designed to maximize party support.

Dukakis had an ad featuring one of the most memorable television moments of the campaign, with Democratic vice presidential candidate Lloyd Bentsen turning to Quayle during their debate and saying, "Senator, you're no Jack Kennedy."

Republicans countered with the Great Communicator.

"America is at peace, and we are prosperous once more. ... On Tuesday, I hope you will vote Republican — up and down the ticket — to continue the change we began in 1981," said President Reagan in a 30-second GOP television commercial.

Bush and Dukakis both were on morning television programs while embarking on another dawn-to-dusk dash through key battleground states.

In a live 30-minute interview on NBC's "Today" show and later at campaign appearances in Illinois and elsewhere, Bush said any political wounds would heal in the weeks after the election. "I think the country will come together," he said. The vice president also renewed his no-new-taxes pledge.

Bush heatedly denied that his attacks on Dukakis over the Massachusetts prison furlough program had racist overtones.

K-State, KU out to end winless streaks

Cross-state rivals fighting for pride

K-State Wildcats vs. Kansas Jayhawks

Game Time: 1 p.m. Saturday.
Place: Kansas Memorial Stadium (50,250).
TV: None. Radio: Wildcat Radio Network (KMAN 1350 AM).
Season Records: K-State 0-8, 0-4; Kansas 0-8, 0-4.
Series Record: Kansas leads 56-24-5.
Notes: The last time KU beat K-State was the last time the Wildcats were in Lawrence, where the Jayhawks rolled to a 38-7 victory in 1985 ... A win Saturday would make K-State coach Stan Parrish the only Wildcat coach never to lose to the Jayhawks ... The Wildcats had a chance to win last season's game between the two rivals, but Mark Porter's field goal try was blocked with three seconds remaining to ensure the tie, 17-17 ... Should K-State safety Erick Harper return an interception for a touchdown against the Jayhawks Saturday, it would mark the third straight year he has recorded the feat against KU.

University of Kansas tailback Arnold Snell is stopped by K-State linebacker Lorne Whittle during 1987's tie game. Both teams will be looking for their first win of the season this Saturday in Lawrence. Despite both teams' poor standings, the game will draw attention.

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

Saturday's K-State vs. University of Kansas football game won't mean much in the way of conference standings or bowl hopes, but the intrastate rivalry seems to always make for some interesting football.

Last year's contest, which ended in a 17-17 tie, was the last time that either of the two teams did not lose. Both teams are in the midst of winless streaks. K-State's has reached 25 games, currently the longest in the nation, while KU has run its streak to 15 games, the second longest.

"The rivalry is there and it's always going to be there," Wildcat head coach Stan Parrish said. "I think rivalries like this are great. I think it's what college football is all about. It allows for a better atmosphere.

"I feel sorry for other schools that go through a season without a rivalry. It really allows for a buildup."

While rivalries often detract from players' performances the week prior to the game, this year's buildup might be helping the Wildcats, as the team's practices have been better.

"Our practices this week have been very spirited," Parrish said. "We've had good intensity and our concentration level has been really high this past week. The kids have been having fun this week, and at the same time they are doing what we want them to do."

Although the teams have identical 0-8 overall records and 0-4 Big Eight Conference marks, the players will still have quite a a lot on the line.

"It's a big rivalry and something that every player looks forward to playing in," KU quarterback Kelly Donohoe said. "Even though it won't be labeled a big game, it will be big to the players."

"As a player you always look for cross-state rivalries," KU center Chip Budde said. "No matter what our two teams' records are, we will be playing for pride."

K-State players echoed these sentiments.

"I think beating KU would be big, no matter what its record is," K-State defensive end Danny Needham said. "It would be our first win and it could make the end of our season a lot more bearable and give us something to build on for the future."

"We are going in with the attitude that they are just like any other team and that we want to win," Wildcat linebacker Maurice Henry said. "They have the same record as us, and we know how good we are so I don't think we'll let their record fool us."

The Wildcats will come out with their passing attack and a blitzing defense and perhaps some surprises.

"I'm sure that both teams will try to do what they do best," Parrish said. "If this game was played earlier in the year you might get a different

Former KU recruit Askew admits to NCAA violations

By The Associated Press

ALBANY, N.Y. — Vincent Askew, who two years ago was recruited by the University of Kansas, has admitted that he accepted recruiting inducements from the school in the form of airline tickets, clothing, and cash for a no-show job, all in violation of NCAA regulations.

Kansas, which won the national championship last year, was placed on probation for three years by the NCAA on Tuesday because of recruiting violations.

"I feel bad, real bad...terrible," Askew told the Albany Times Union on Wednesday. "To me, this is all very embarrassing. Some of my decisions during my college career I, today, do question.

"It was really all very overwhelming," said Askew, one of 18 players trying out for the Albany Patroons of the Continental Basketball Association. "Everything that happened was great at the time. But it was always people like the alumni that offered me things...it was never the coaches."

In 1986, Askew had just completed his sophomore year at Memphis State but was looking to transfer and former Kansas coach Larry Brown recruited him.

Askew spent the summer of 1986 on the Kansas campus in Lawrence but never played for the Jayhawks. He returned to Memphis State for his junior year, then skipped his final season and was drafted by the NBA's Philadelphia 76ers.

But it was while he was being recruited by Kansas that several violations occurred.

"I really didn't realize back then what was going on," Askew said in a report in Thursday's editions of the Times Union. "But my last year at Memphis State, the NCAA people came around and started asking me questions. I really didn't know what was going to happen. Now, the whole thing is a nightmare. I think the probation was too harsh...I was really surprised it was so much."

An NCAA report said an unidentified representative of Kansas's athletic interests paid $183 for an airline ticket for Askew to fly from Memphis to Kansas City. Brown said that he personally paid $364 for a round-trip ticket so Askew could return to Memphis to visit his sick grandmother, who later died.

"I'd give it to anybody if he told me his grandmother was passing away," Brown said. "It wasn't something I was trying to hide."

At the time, Askew said, he didn't think twice about accepting the ticket. His grandmother had raised him.

Conference reprimands ISU coach

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Iowa State football Coach Jim Walden, who bitterly criticized the officiating in his team's 24-12 loss to Colorado last weekend, was reprimanded by the Big Eight Conference Thursday.

The conference office issued a statement saying that Walden, who among other things suggested that the officials owed his players an apology, is being censured for his public comments.

Walden said he had no regrets.

"I think you do have the right to say something was done poorly when you know that it was," Walden said from his office in Ames. "I said it, I'm glad I said it, I think it was necessary to say it for the protection of my players."

The Big Eight said the coach violated a conference rule requiring that "all comments regarding evaluations of the performance of officials made by a coach shall be forwarded to the conference office."

"Under no circumstances shall a coach comment publicly or issue statements for release to the public criticizing an official's performance," the rule says.

After Saturday's game at Boulder, Walden said he had never been more angry at a group of officials.

Cincinnati placed on probation

CINCINNATI — The University of Cincinnati football and basketball teams were banned from postseason play for one year Thursday and placed on probation for three years for NCAA recruiting and scholarship violations.

Among other violations, the NCAA said Cincinnati gave financial aid to basketball players who were ineligible, allowed non-scholarship players to attend school without paying tuition, exceeded limitations on football and basketball scholarships and used gym classes as out-of-season football practices.

Train

After the research is complete, the building begins. Some of the pieces are ordered from railroad model magazines, but most are cut out of flat sheets of plastic. A skeleton image of the train is pieced together, electronics of the train are made, the engine is painted and decals are attached. The final touch is airbrushing the engine's body.

"Airbrushing gives it that touch of the grime of life," Priest said.

When the engine is complete, it is worth about $150 and countless hours of work, but the couple said they have no thought of giving up the hobby.

"I don't think I'll ever grow tired of it because it is really a jack-of-all-trades hobby. I can sit down one night and do a massive electronic board; the next night I can draft or do genealogy or research — anything I feel like," Priest said.

When the couple build the railroad configuration that will link two imaginary cities, not only must the cars, buildings and engines be constructed, but they must also build the electronic system so all the lights will work. Finally, their layout design must efficiently transport the products between the two towns.

"It's like a giant board game," Steve said. "Each business is creating a product, and it is the railroad's job to transport them," he said.

The track will transport the products by unlinking cars at manufacturers. After a couple of days, an engine will pick up the cars and transport the product to the location it needs to go.

When the couple become bored of building the blue and yellow train products, they can pursue the hobby in other ways.

The possiblities are endless. Priest already drives a blue and yellow Volkswagen bug painted like an engine; he has painted and photographed engines; and the couple has a computer program which produces line drawings of Santa Fe engines.

"It gets in your blood. You see something that has not been modeled, and you think, 'I really need one of those,'" Priest said.

charge of operating the sprinkler systems.

All the other small plots are watered with sprinklers. A staff of about four people operate these sprinklers. When a problem with winds blowing the water across the sidewalks occurs, it is fixed as soon as the watering crew is informed of it, said Reba Snavely, assistant director of facility custodial services.

The watering crews work on the lawns from daylight until dusk, six days a week, and sometimes even seven, Snavely said.

The ground service started a program about four years ago to grow fescue grass on all the lawns, Lee said. Fescue grass grows the best in this area. Before, the lawns were a combination of Kentucky bluegrass, Bermuda and fescue grasses.

Kansas weather is too hot for bluegrass and too cold for Bermuda, he said.

The grounds crews also work on the flower beds on campus. There are about 45 flower beds on campus, Snavely said. But the number of beds varies each year. The flower beds are planted during the spring before graduation weekend, Lee said.

They buy whatever plants are available from local greenhouses.

"We are going to start growing our own plants in our own greenhouses," he said, "This will give us more of a diversity of plants."

pledged for the amount that would have gone to the making of a meal, skipped by each house on Monday, will be donated to the Breadbasket."

Tarvestad said the food drive competition consists of 21 greek houses in six groups, participating in a door-to-door collection of food donations throughout Manhattan on Tuesday and Thursday from 4:30 to 6:30 p.m.

"Any student wishing to make a donation toward the food drive can bring food items to the Greek Affairs office in the Union anytime during the week or to the Union island Nov. 11, from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m.," Tarvested said.

Another activity included in Operation Turkey is movie discounts at the Union on Wednesday and Friday nights, she said. Discounts on movie tickets will be given in exchange for a donated canned food item.

"We hope to raise about $2,000 with Miss-A-Meal," Tarvestad said. "The goal we set for donated, nonperishable food items is 4,000 pounds or more."

Last year the project raised $1,500 through Miss-A-Meal and collected 3,500 pounds of donated food, she said.

Awards will be presented during halftime of the K-State vs. Iowa State football game Nov. 12 to the top three groups collecting the most food donations.

look, but being the ninth game of the season I don't imagine either team will do anything drastically different.

"I think we might throw a couple of surprises at them. I just hope that everybody that is going to the game is in their seats at 1 (p.m.) so they don't miss any of them."

As far as injuries go, both teams will be affected, but the extent won't really be known until game time.

"I think we'll have everybody," Parrish said. "We have Jim Oehm back. We're not sure whether Paul Watson will play. He practiced Tuesday, and we probably won't know whether he'll play until right before game time."

"This is a big game for us," KU head coach Glen Mason said. "We have a number of guys hobbling around that we'll have to try to patch up before the game.

"I thought it would be hard for K-State to play football after Coach Parrish announced his resignation, but they haven't let up. In fact, they are playing better as of late. They just haven't been able to get a win. I'm impressed."

Drama helps exceptional actors grow

Hans Clodhopper, portrayed by David Klabunde, shows actor Kevin Holman a present for a princess in the play "Hans Clodhopper."

Sitting in the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Round House is Deb Engstrom, a woman who has dedicated her life to helping people with mental retardation.

On the small stage a few feet in front of her stands Georgia Becker, manager, and Nancy Stover, music director, orienting the 13 actors and actresses of the Exceptional Theater Company for the next play they'll be performing.

The actors and actresses of the Exceptional Theater Company are people with mental retardation, ranging in age from 16 to 31.

"We always have an introduction to theater," said Engstrom, manager of the company, pointing to the people on stage, "and an extensive orientation to the play, before ever beginning the actual rehearsal."

The Exceptional Theater Company was formed in 1984. It grew out of a couple of things, Engstrom said.

"It grew out of the Theater for Special Populations class at K-State and the program run by Nancy Stover called Lifesong Theater," Engstrom said. "The kids were ready for more structured theater, so Georgia Becker, Nancy Stover and I began the Exceptional Theater Company."

Since 1984, the Exceptional Theater Company has written and produced two plays and has presented each to a wide variety of audiences.

The company is working on its third play, "Pocahontas," which will be performed in the spring. Although the Exceptional Theater Company is working on a new play, it is continuing to present its second play, "Hans Clodhopper," which it began in the fall of 1986.

The company usually does several performances at the First Lutheran Church for elementary and college classes before it takes the play somewhere else, Becker said.

Jeff Fronce and Robert Buckner use a globe to re-enact the travels of John Smith from England to Virginia.

"We'll keep doing 'Hans Clodhopper' and 'Pocahontas,' and we'll revitalize 'Daniel Boone,' the first play we did," Engstrom said. "We'll then have a repertoire of three plays."

Engstrom said that when the company chooses a play to produce, it then takes into account the actors' and actresses' abilities.

It usually takes one school term of practicing for 1½ hours twice a week for the actors to be able to perform a play, Becker said.

"We take a story that's easy to tell the kids, a story that has a lot of action. Georgia then writes the script to fit our kids and their disabilities," Engstrom said. "We have kids in mind for certain parts even before we write the play."

The orientation period for each play before the actual rehearsal begins is designed to teach the actors about that period in history in which the play is set.

"For example, when we began our first play, 'Daniel Boone,' the kids didn't know how Indians live, so we took them to Medicine Lodge to see how Indians live," she said.

Becker said the plays help the people with their speech, movement and self-confidence.

"We had one girl who had a terrible problem of constantly crying, but she really wanted to be in the play ('Hans Clodhopper,')" she said. We told her that she couldn't cry during a performance because it would ruin it. She really controlled herself.

Ag follies to feature faculty in hog-calling contest Sunday

By Jody Hundley
Collegian Reporter

Imagine watching and listening to a K-State instructor competing in a hog-calling contest.

College of Agriculture students will be treated to such an experience at the college's fourth annual Ag Fall Follies beginning 1 p.m. Sunday at the Brandeberry Indoor Complex.

"Brent Lehner came up with the idea of having the faculty do the hog calling," said Gay Conley, junior in agricultural economics and committee co-chairman. "I can't wait to hear them."

The hog-calling contest will begin at 4 p.m. with contests already in progress stopping for the special event, Conley said.

"It's a time to see a different side of the faculty members," said Melanie Mainquist, senior in animal sciences and industry and Ag Student Council president.

Conley said the follies will consist of 20 teams, each with 10 members. Each team paid a $10 entry fee.

"Each team must have at least one faculty member or, in some cases, a graduate student in a teaching position is acceptable," Conley said.

The teams this year include two from the pre-vet club, one from Block and Bridle, one from Alpha Gamma Rho and one team of Haymaker Hall residents majoring in agriculture, said Conley.

"All team members are from the College of Agriculture," Conley said.

Brent Lehner, junior in animal sciences and industry, expects participants to have a lot of fun.

"The follies is a way of promoting fellowship within the College of Agriculture," Lehner said. "It won't be a 'let's beat the other guys' type of competition. It's people from the College of Agriculture getting together to have some fun."

The follies is a combination of faculty and students setting aside time to have fun, said David Mugler, associate dean of the College of Agriculture.

"It's a grand afternoon," said Mugler, also the director of resident instruction within the college. "It nutures a good working relationship between faculty and students."

About 200 participants will compete in a double-elimination volleyball tournament, tug of war, wheelbarrow races and balloon toss.

The Ag Fall Follies was first organized four years ago, Mugler said.

"The faculty probably organized the follies and pushed it through Ag Student Council," Lehner said. "They wanted to get involved with students."

"It's on a Sunday afternoon," Conley said. "How many instructors on campus would give their day off to participate in a lot of silly games with students?"

Mainquist said enthusiasm is a big key to the success of the follies.

"The enthusiasm must stem from students," Mainquist said. "Students organize all activities within the College of Agriculture. Clubs are very involved."

The follies is becoming a tradition, she said, and students and faculty look forward to it every year.

"The word will spread about how fun it is and that will keep students in the college," Mainquist said.

Conley said a traveling trophy will be presented to the winning team and plaques will be awarded to the top three teams.

Bureau project on target

By Mark Rader
Collegian Reporter

Construction on the new $14.3 million headquarters for the Kansas Farm Bureau is continuing on schedule for its completion in mid-March, said project manager Robert Larson.

"We are coming down to some critical time periods," said Larson, vice president and investment manager for the bureau. "It's like a giant puzzle — certain pieces have to fit just right before the next step can be taken."

In December of 1985, the bureau's board of directors decided that building a new facility would be more cost efficient than expanding the current facility located at 2321 Anderson Avenue.

The architectural firm of Shaeffer, Johnson, Cox, Frey and Associates from Wichita was hired to design the five-story building.

In March of 1987, ground was broken at the new site located on 45 acres of land in northwest Manhattan off of Seth Childs Road. The Martin K. Eby Construction firm from Wichita began work on the new building in October of that year.

"This is a well thought out facility," he said. "It's built from the inside out taking in all of the growth needs and then wrapping it up with an exterior skin."

The new facility will consist of 218,000 square feet of space, more than double the size of the present building which is on five to six acres, Larson said.

The current building is up for sale, he said. There has been some interest, but so far there have been no negotiations.

Production focus of cattle event

By Jody Hundley
Collegian Reporter

Cattle industry people from at least five states are gathering in Garden City this morning for the 1988 Cattle Feeders' Day to discuss issues relative to the growing industry.

The branch of K-State's Division of Cooperative Extension in Garden City, the Southwest Area Research-Extension Center, is hosting the event. The theme will be "Recent Developments in Production Efficiency, Quality and Yield in Cattle," said Bob Brandt, K-State beef cattle nutritionist and assistant professor in animal sciences and industry.

People from southwest Kansas, Colorado, Oklahoma, Nebraska and Texas will attend the half-day meeting, Brandt said.

The participants, mostly industry professionals, managers of feed yards and small producers, will be primarily from Kansas, but people from surrounding states are also expected, Brandt said.

"We have a good program lined up with out-of-state speakers discussing timely topics."

One of the key speakers, Brandt said, is Dell Allen, director of quality and training at Excel Corporation in Wichita.

Allen's subject is "Beef Carcass Value — A Packer's Perspective."

"When Dell begins speaking about the packer's perspective, you can be sure that a lot of ears will be tuned in," he said.

The Cattle Feeders' Day, which was moved from the spring to the fall, was initially designed to bring producers and industry people to the research station for updates, Brandt said. The change in the time of year was to appeal to producers and accommodate farmers.

"If there's a warm day in the spring and it coincides with Cattle Feeders' Day, most producers will work rather than attend a meeting.

"It's expanded in past years, not only to highlight research, but for cattle industry people to hear speakers discuss timely issues," he said. "We wanted to extend research information to producers and industry."

Brandt said the meeting encompasses more topics than in past years.

The program includes Ted Montgomery, professor in animal science at West Texas State University in Canyon, who will speak about nutrition and management effects on beef quality and yield.

Brandt will speak about fat utilization of finishing cattle; and Danny Simms, K-State Extension livestock specialist, will focus on the effect of breed type on carcass traits.

"We're laying groundwork for the future," he said. "The packers are concerned with carcass type — what the consumer wants is not necessarily what the producer has."

Brandt described the material presented as more philosophical and thought-provoking, rather than information that can be immediately implemented by participants.

"It will expand the horizons of carcass type of cattle. Producers will think about quality of the carcass and nutrition for cattle (as it pertains to the packer). The producers will begin to think, 'What does the packer want?'" he said.

Cattle Feeders' Day was started about 20 years ago, Brandt said.

Brandt came to Manhattan in July, after working 2½ years at the Southwest Kansas Research-Extension Center. Four extension stations are located throughout Kansas, with the main center located on campus.

"We're here to accomplish the goal of getting different segments of the cattle industry together," he said. "It's a continual, ongoing process of educating the industry and the industry responding to produce a product the consumer wants."

Wichita oil tycoon settles loan default

By The Associated Press

WICHITA — Oil man Donald Slawson has paid the Mellon Bank of Pittsburgh $45 million to settle a $163 million loan default that forced him to sell off a large portion of his petroleum holdings.

The bank agreed to drop a foreclosure lawsuit against Slawson's Wichita real estate holdings.

Slawson owes Mellon $12 million in real estate loans. He was given the option of settling that debt for $6 million by Jan. 31.

He also was given until Jan. 31 to settle a separate, unspecified debt with an unnamed subsidiary operation.

Vintage Petroleum Co. of Tulsa apparently helped Slawson make the Mellon deal.

Wildlife area receives help

By Guy Peverley
Collegian Reporter

Dedication ceremonies Thursday marked the first step to revitalize and preserve the Cheyenne Bottoms Wildlife Area near Great Bend with the recent purchase of an amphibious backhoe.

The specialized backhoe is mounted on pontoons, allowing the operators to work in wet, muddy areas where conventional heavy equipment would become stuck, said Joe Kramer, chief of the fish and wildlife division of the Kansas Fish and Game in Pratt.

"The backhoe is 100 percent mobile," Kramer said. It can be moved between locations without disassembling, which allows a great convenience.

The machine cost $227,000 and was purchased with the help of a $94,000 contribution from Ducks Unlimited. The rest came from the Wildlife and Parks Department's Chickadee Checkoff Non-Game Program and fee fund.

"The backhoe will be a tremendous help in managing the water that comes to the wetlands," said Jan Garton, member of the Kansas Audubon Council. The machine will assist in making nesting islands for shorebirds and will make for better storage and maintenance of the water.

The Cheyenne Bottoms has had a history of water supply problems. The problems have become more serious in recent years, due to siltation and natural aging of the wetlands. The backhoe will help allow for the removal of silt that now hinders the water level, Kramer said.

On a long-term basis, the Bottoms are threatened, said Ted Cable, assistant professor in forestry. The lack of water in the Arkansas River, which feeds the Bottoms, is one of the culprits of the endangered Bottoms. Also, the increased irrigation practices by farmers due to the drought has hindered the amount of water to reach the wetlands, Cable said.

Acquiring the backhoe is just the first of many steps to be taken to revive the Bottoms, Kramer said. Other steps initiated are employment of more personnel to better manage the wetlands and funding to better the habitat for threatened and endangered species.

"Management of the area is top priority," Kramer said.

Reapportionment amendment sought

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Legislative leaders are urging Kansas voters to approve on Tuesday a proposed constitutional amendment changing the timing of legislative redistricting, despite disagreement over whether both houses should be reapportioned in 1989.

The amendment would remove from the state constitution a requirement that the Legislature reapportion itself in the ninth year of each decade, and replace it with a requirement that the redistricting occur in the second year of each decade — 1992, 2002, 2012, etc.

The reason for the proposed change is the state got itself into trouble with the federal courts by trying to use outdated population figures for its reapportionment.

A three-judge federal panel told the state in ruling on a lawsuit in the early 1980s that Kansas could not use 1980 U.S. Census figures to reapportion the Legislature in 1989.

Because the state abandoned its own census in 1979, it didn't have any fresh population figures upon which to base next year's required redistricting. So the Legislature had the secretary of state's office conduct a special state census this year to get new figures.

That cost the state about $3.3 million, and nobody wants to repeat that cost when the federal government takes a census at the start of each decade.

The proposed amendment, the only one on the general election ballot Tuesday, says the Legislature "shall by law reapportion the state representative districts, the state senatorial districts, or both the state representative and senatorial districts upon the basis of the latest census of the inhabitants of the state taken by authority (of the 1987 law ordering the special state census."

Lawyers in the revisor of statutes office say that means the Legislature is required to reapportion the House or the Senate or both. They see no conflict between what the amendment actually says and what an explanatory statement that accompanies it on the ballot says.

The amendment also says the Legislature must reapportion both its houses in 1992 and each 10 years after that, using the latest U.S. Census figures.

The state is under federal court mandate to reapportion the House in the 1989 session using the new state census figures, because representatives are up for election again in 1990.

But a debate is likely over whether the Senate also must be reapportioned next year, inasmuch as senators will not be elected again until 1992. The Senate would just have to be redistricted a second time when the U.S. Census figures become available after 1990.

The proposed amendment is worded so the Legislature is not ordered to redistrict the Senate next session.

However, Robert Coldsnow, the legislature's lawyer, said two things point to the need to reapportion the Senate as well as the House in 1989.

One is the fact that constitution dictates that state Board of Education districts shall be made up of four senatorial districts. There are 40 Senate districts and 10 Board of Education districts.

If the Senate is not redistricted next year, Coldsnow said, someone could challenge legality of electing under the present senatorial districts five members of the Board of Education whose seats come up for re-election in 1990. It could be argued the board districts are apportioned on such outdated population figures that they violate the one-man, one-vote principle.

The other reason, Coldsnow said, is the general principle espoused by the courts in some decisions that both houses of a Legislature must be apportioned under the same census figures or the balance of representation is skewered.

Three of four legislative leaders interviewed said they hope the people approve the amendment, to avoid having to take an expensive state census late in each decade.

The fourth, Senate Minority Leader Michael Johnston, reiterated his opposition to "the whole process" of requiring any reapportionment in 1989.

"I wanted to ask the people to let us go until 1991 and use the new federal census, so we didn't have to go through this special census," Johnston said.

So much so that during a performance she broke her glasses but waited until she was off the stage before she began to cry.

Engstrom said the theater company gets mostly private donations and that it takes a free-will offering at each presentation.

"Some service clubs, like the Junction City Lions Club, have asked us to perform before their meetings, and then the members donate money," she said.

It also receives grants from the Kansas Arts Commission and Southwestern Bell Telephone, which sponsors educational programs.

The theater company applied for a grant from the Kansas Arts Commission to put together its third play. This grant was contingent upon obtaining matching funds from local sources, but one of those sources did not provide the expected funds, Engstrom said, so the theater company is looking for other sources of raising funds.

The theater company has recently written to the fraternities and sororities at K-State to encourage their membership to consider undertaking a fund-raising project on the theater company's behalf.

"We're the only program of this kind in Kansas," Engstrom said. "The kids learn so much in just the preparation process of the plays."

The Exceptional Theater Company would like to heighten awareness in regard to the amazing abilities of those so often considered unable to do so many things, Engstrom said.

"Our two main objectives are the benefits for the kids, and producing a well-done performance," she said. "The whole process of producing a play — from the simple beginning to the actual performance — teaches the kids a multitude of academic, social and work-related skills."

Candidates stress student involvement

Laurian Cuffy

John McIntyre

By Richard Broadfoot
Staff Writer

"Getting the students involved" was an often-repeated theme Sunday evening at an informal question and answer session in the Union courtyard that featuring student body presidential candidates Laurian Cuffy and John McIntyre.

"We need a process by which we can get all of the students involved in student government," said Cuffy, senior in management. "We need a unified student body that is aware of the issues and aware of where student government is going."

McIntyre, senior in industrial engineering, echoed that statement, saying increasing residence hall, non-traditional and minority student representation in Student Senate is a top priority in his campaign.

Another issue raised repeatedly was the possible creation of a Senate at-large seat for international students.

Neither candidate said he would rule out the creation of an at-large seat, but both expressed reservations.

"It is indispensible to have representation in Senate for all groups," Cuffy said. "However, we need to look not only into international groups and minority groups, but also at whichever groups feel they are not being represented."

McIntyre agreed, saying there is a problem with minority and international involvement in student government, but he wanted to look further into the problems of why these students are not getting involved.

"There is an apathy problem among international students," McIntyre said. "We need to find out why these students are apathetic towards Student Senate, and we need to find out why they aren't being represented."

The candidates also agreed improving Farrell Library should be a top priority at K-State.

"We need to go to the Legislature and say straight out, 'This library is bad. It is piss-poor and it needs to be improved,'" Cuffy said.

When asked to name the greatest challenge the student body president would face in the coming year, each candidate was quick to answer.

"My greatest challenge will be to represent the students," McIntyre said. "I think past student body presidents have gotten too caught up mingling with legislators and other groups. It is very easy to lose touch with the students."

Cuffy said, "As student body president, I will have to reach out to the students and assure them that, though

Computers attacked by virus

By Lisa Pfannenstiel
Collegian Reporter

K-State's computers were subjected to a virus that has attacked thousands of computers throughout the United States since Thursday.

About 3 a.m. Friday, the virus entered the academic department's system through an electronic mail service. However, the University mainframe computer system was not affected, said Virgil Wallentine, head of the Department of Computer Science and Informational Systems.

When the virus hit, the system was shut down. But it was rebooted and functioning by noon Friday, Wallentine said.

He said the virus was system-specific, and he hoped the early detection has protected the system from being affected by the virus. The virus has not reappeared since the initial detection.

However, the system is still threatened, Wallentine said. If the virus is hiding in storage or if part of the virus is on a timer, its reappearance is unpredictable.

According to the Sept. 26 issue of Time magazine, an estimated 250,000 computers have been hit with viruses in the past nine months. The viruses have disrupted operations, destroyed data and raised questions about the vulnerability of informations systems across the United States.

Time defines a virus as "basically an information disorder. Like its biological counterparts, a computer virus carries in its instructional code the recipe for making perfect copies of itself. Lodged in a host computer, the typical virus takes temporary control of the computer's disk operating system.

"Then, whenever the infected computer comes in contact with a piece of software, a fresh copy of the virus passes into the new program. Thus, the infection can be spread from computer to computer by unsuspecting users who either swap disks or send programs to one another over telephone lines."

Robert Tappan Morris Jr., a graduate student in computer science at Cornell University, was the creator of a virus that jammed more than 6,000 computers during the past week. Originally, three of his friends contacted The New York Times about the mistake. Morris turned himself in to his father, Robert T. Morris Sr., one of the government's top experts on computer security.

Morris was trying to sneak what he thought was a harmless virus into the Arpanet computer network, which is used by universities, military contractors and the Pentagon, according to The Kansas City Star.

"The big issue is that a relatively benign software program can virtually bring our computing community to its knees and keep it there for some time," said Chuck Cole, deputy computer security manager at Lawrence Livermore Laboratory in Livermore, Calif., one of the sites affected by the virus.

"Preventing the attacks is difficult," Wallentine said. "If the programmer knows the execution structure — the internal makeup — of the machine, the complexity of the virus depends on the programmer's creativity."

He said measures taken to prevent viruses include incorporating inscription and virtual memory. Inscription allows only one person

Contamination being estimated

By Mark Rader
Collegian Reporter

Estimates are still being made on the amount of unleaded gasoline spilled from a line at University Amoco and the amount of contamination it caused.

Dave Prater, owner of the station at 17th and Anderson, said the station was closed at 6 p.m. Oct. 11 so repairs to the pumps could be completed. It was reopened Oct. 15.

The leak was discovered Oct. 11 while city officials were investigating reports from citizens about a gas smell in the area. City employees tested the sewer line along Anderson Avenue and discovered its contents to be 80 percent combustible.

The cost to the station to correct the leak, Prater said, could not be estimated because bills for services to correct the problem are still coming in. In addition, Amoco Oil Company is still unable to specify the amount of gasoline that spilled from the broken pipe.

Amoco is responsible for determining a line of zero contamination in the area and then alleviating the contamination, said Dale Robl, environmental geologist for the Kansas Department of Health and Environment.

The amount of work Amoco must do to clear the area depends upon the extent of the contamination, he said. The goal is to have no gasoline left in the soil. Amoco has drilled a number of wells in the vicinity of the leak to try to determine the level of contamination.

Robl said numerous cases of gas leaks in Kansas can be attributed to the age of pipes, as was the problem at Amoco.

Environmental Technology Inc. was hired to repair the broken pipe and to remove as much of the gasoline from the area as possible, Prater said.

The company laid a series of drainage pipes to collect water and gasoline in the area. This fluid is collected at a central pipe. From there, a pump separates and removes the gas and stores it in a large tank in front of the building.

Bruce McCallum, Manhattan's director of public works, said the city spent about $9,000 in man-hours and equipment on the cleaning.

City employees and equipment were used primarily for support and traffic control, McCallum said.

During research of the gas leak area, city employees discovered a broken sanitary sewer main under the road. City officials decided to take advantage of the road being blocked because of the gas leak to dig up and repair the sewer main, he said.

Insurance, Prater said, will cover any financial loss during the station's downtime. University Amoco did have a drop in business following its reopening, he said. However, once people realized the station was open, business returned to normal.

"People were dying to get in here from curiosity to know what was going on," Prater said.

Hospital marks beginning of project

By The Collegian Staff

Groundbreaking ceremonies Friday afternoon at Memorial Hospital marked the beginning of a $3.2 million renovation and expansion project.

The project will take 20 months, said Michael Nunamaker, hospital administrator. Most of the funding, $2.2 million, came from a hospital revenue bond and the remaining funds are from a capital fund at the hospital.

Construction will begin immediately and will be completed in two phases, said Julie Davenport, director of marketing.

The contractor is Abbott Construction of Manhattan. The entire facility will be renovated and 2,700 square feet will be added, Davenport said.

"We are building all-new surgical suites, expanding the emergency room, the intensive care unit and the front part of the hospital," she said.

"We are taking care of the clinical areas that needed to be expanded and improved due to advancements in today's technology," Davenport said.

Nunamaker said the expansion is the first major renovation pro-

Campaign exception given

By Erwin Seba
Senior Staff Writer

Student body presidential candidate Laurian Cuffy was granted an exception to the campaign expenditure report filing deadline prior to the Student Governing Association general election Tuesday and Wednesday.

Two candidates, Cuffy, a senior in management, and Mike Cormaci, senior in agricultural economics, failed to meet the 5 p.m., Oct. 31, deadline for the filing of expenditure reports prior to the general election.

Cormaci's name was removed from the general election ballot for not filing a report because he did not provide acceptable grounds for granting an exception, said Eva Chatterjee, elections committee chairwoman.

Cuffy is one of two candidates who will be in the presidential runoff election Wednesday.

One member of the committee resigned because he believed Chatterjee had not consulted with the committee before the exception was granted to Cuffy.

Brad McMillan, senior in political science, resigned Thursday "due to personal differences with the definition of SGA election policies."

Admitting he learned of the events surrounding the granting of an exception to Cuffy's campaign second-hand, McMillan said he wanted to let people know that "the leaders of the elections committee allowed an expenditure report to be turned in 30 minutes late."

Chatterjee said Cuffy was granted an exception due to the reason for the failure to meet the deadline.

"We decided we should let (Cuffy) stay on the ballot because it was a personal emergency," she said.

Chatterjee had told Cuffy shortly after 5 p.m., Oct. 31, that his name would be removed from the ballot because he had failed to file an expenditure report.

At about 5:10 p.m., Ira Bolden, Cuffy's campaign manager, called Chatterjee to explain why the report had not been filed.

"I called Eva and she said 'OK, you get the report in and we'll see (about granting an exception),'" he said.

Bolden, who was supposed to file the report, said he had been unable to attend a 2:45 p.m. meeting with Cuffy and Cuffy's campaign treasurer Dan Howard, who prepared the reports.

"I was helping one of my students," Bolden said. He teaches a study skills class.

Chatterjee said Bolden told her he was helping a student who was having a personal problem and did not feel he could leave the student. Bolden declined to state the nature of the student's problem.

Bolden said he could not have met with Howard prior to 5 p.m. because he was with the student until that time. And Howard would have been unavailable because he was working at his job driving a school bus.

Bolden then met with Howard and gave him receipts for the expenses incurred since the previous expenditure report had been filed. With the 2nd amnesty phase begins

The second phase of the federal government's immigration amnesty program starts Monday, when thousands of amnesty recipients can begin applying for permanent residency and get their so-called green cards.

Federal officials expect about 1.5 million of the 1.8 million non-agricultural workers who applied for amnesty under the Immigration Reform and Control Act of 1986 to apply for permanent residency.

But that figure may be optimistic, authorities said, because some potential applicants could find themselves shut out of overcrowded English and civics classes they must take to qualify for permanent residency.

In Los Angeles, at least one school — the Evans Community Adult School — has been holding classes 24 hours a day to handle the crush.

In Dallas, classes for amnesty recipients are free in public schools, but many attend privately-run programs.

In New York City, classes will be offered by the Board of Education, the City University of New York and many community-based organizations.

New York's applicants represent 153 nations and pose a challenge to educators, according to Garrett Murphy, director of the state Department of Education's Division of Continuing Education.

"We probably have more language groups and more languages than any other state," Murphy said.

Arthur Helton, a spokesman for the Lawyer's Committee for Human Rights, predicted New York state would be "overwhelmed" by a late swarm of applicants because the U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service has done little to inform immigrants about the education program.

Nebraskans discuss compact

SCOTTSBLUFF, Neb. — Proponents and opponents of a Nov. 8 ballot issue that would remove Nebraska from a low-level radioactive waste compact disagreed recently on the effects the measure would have on use of radioactive materials in medicine.

Initiative 402 could have national significance. It is the first referendum in the country on whether a state should withdraw from a low-level radioactive waste compact.

A citizen's group based in Washington, D.C., said medical facilities wouldn't be forced to close or curtail operations if Initiative 402 passed.

But a Pender physician said medical research would be put in jeopardy. The trend is for nuclear medicine to produce more radioactive waste in the future, Dr. David Hoelting said.

Initiative 402 would remove Nebraska from the Central Interstate Compact, which has chosen Nebraska to host a regional dump for low-level radioactive waste. It also would require a vote before any nuclear waste faiclity could be built in Nebraska.

Other states in the compact are Kansas, Oklahoma, Arkansas and Louisiana.

Under federal law, each state must by 1993 take responsibility for disposal of the low-level radioactive waste it generates.

The Nuclear Information and Resource Service out of Washington issued a news release Saturday countering claims made by a group that opposes the Nov. 8 ballot issue.

The group, Nebraskans Against 402, has said that withdrawing from the compact would cause problems for nuclear power plants, the main source of low-level waste; medicine, which uses radioactive materials for diagnosis and treatment of various illnesses; and research that requires radioacive materials.

Sakharov visits United States

BOSTON — Andrei D. Sakharov arrived here Sunday to visit with relatives and undergo medical tests on his first visit outside the Soviet Union after years of agitation over Soviet human rights policies.

Speaking through a translator, the tall, balding physicist and Nobel laureate called himself a free man but said others remain in prison who helped him through his years in internal exile in a Soviet city closed to Westerners.

"Two years ago, I became a free man when I returned from Gorky to Moscow. Now I have become even freer because I have been granted the right to travel around the world," Sakharov told reporters during a brief meeting.

"But a man who staged a one-person demonstration on my behalf in January 1980 when I was exiled to Gorky remains in prison. The name of that man is Vazif Meilanov ... and I feel it is my duty now, at this moment, to remember this man and many others who remain in prison."

Meilanov is a Soviet mathematician.

Among the relatives Sakharov will visit in the Boston area are his stepson Alexei Semyonov, Semyonov's wife, Liza Alekseyeva, and their 4-year-old daughter Alexandra, whom he never has seen.

Sakharov also will participate in the first board meeting outside the Soviet Union of the International Foundation for the Survival and Development of Humanity. The foundation was formed in January by Soviet and U.S. scientists and educators to support research on global problems.

Gasoline prices rise 20 cents

LOS ANGELES — Retail gasoline prices made an unseasonal jump in the past two weeks as dealers passed on short-term cost increases, an industry analyst said Sunday.

The average price of gasoline for all grades and types of services, including taxes, rose 20 cents a gallon to 100.23 cents a gallon between Oct. 21 and Nov. 4, said Trilby Lundberg.

It was the first price increase since the end of the summer driving season in late August, she said.

The Lundberg Survey of 12,000 gasoline stations nationwide found the following average prices for self-service, which accounts for most gasoline sales: Regular unleaded, 90.77 cents a gallon; premium unleaded, 106.06 cents and regular leaded, 87.28 cents.

Full service prices were 119.58 cents a gallon for regular unleaded, 130.13 cents for premium unleaded and 116.66 cents for regular leaded.

Cocaine seizure state record

WICHITA — Federal agents confiscated nearly 12 pounds of cocaine Sunday night outside a Wichita restaurant, the largest seizure in Kansas history, authorities said.

Three Texas residents were arrested, said Otto Privette, head of the Drug Enforcement Agency's Wichita-based task force.

Agents confiscated 11¾ pounds of cocaine that could have a street value of nearly $1.4 million, Privette said. He said the bags contained nearly pure cocaine that had been brought into the country direct from Colombia.

The three suspects were arrested about 5:30 p.m. in the parking lot outside a Denny's restaurant in west Wichita. Two of the suspects were armed but offered no resistance, Privette said.

The undercover investigation began about three months ago when an agent from the DEA's Kansas City office started negotiations to buy a large shipment of cocaine, Privette said.

The suspects were arrested as they were delivering the shipment to the agent at the restaurant.

K-State aiding NASA with station program

By Paul Branson
Staff Writer

Terry Johnson, director of the Division of Biology, recently represented K-State on a panel that devised guidelines for selecting crew members for a space station being planned by NASA.

NASA, along with the European Space Agency, Japan and Canada, is planning a space station for earth orbit that will conduct long-term as well as short-term scientific experiments. The target date for completion of the space station is 1995.

Johnson said NASA plans to have crews inhabiting the space station continuously.

"NASA is planning to have eight people up there all the time with a change of crew every six months," Johnson said.

"These people will have different qualifications and duties than astronauts," Johnson said. "Astronauts are basically pilots. NASA will need generalists, people who can be technicians for the experiments that are taking place."

Johnson said he was chosen on the basis of the K-State biology division's reputation. "NASA was very impressed with our division especially since we have a very diverse faculty that works well together," he said.

"K-State and Colarado are involved in a project called BioServe Space Technologies," said Johnson, who directs the K-State half of the joint venture. "K-State handles the biology end of it and Colorado is in charge of engineering.

"Our goal is to bring advancements from space technology to the private sector, and NASA was impressed with how well our two universities worked together."

Johnson said the length of time in orbit and isolation, and the fact that the astronauts would be constantly visible to the world presented some interesting problems in crew selection.

"Since the astronauts will be from different countries we had to decide on an official language for the space station, and that language will be English," Johnson said.

"One of the questions that came up was whether or not a crew member could use any other language while in the space station," Johnson said. "We decided the answer should be no, since the other crew members might think he was talking about them and hostilities could arise. Six months is a long time to spend with eight people."

Johnson said while he was in Houston he saw a mock-up of the proposed space station.

"It was awesome. The structure is one and a half times the length of a football field with various living and experimental modules on it," he said. "Canada is contributing a robotic arm which will be able to travel along the outside of the framework and grab modules or whatever."

Ideas important in receiving grants

By Erwin Seba
Senior Staff Writer

Whether or not a faculty member receives a research grant may depend on something as simple — or as difficult — as an idea.

"The main thing is to think of an idea of what you want to research," said Cornelia Flora, faculty senate president and professor of sociology, anthropology and social work.

After developing the initial idea for a research project, a faculty member must find a granting entity interested in financing the research.

And the entity must be convinced "that the idea is worth researching and that you are the best person to do that research," Flora said.

Finding the organization may be determined by program announcements made by funding agencies.

Program announcements range from formal, specific statements of what the agency will support to general, informal statements, said Robert Lowman, associate dean of the Graduate School.

Once a research proposal is given to a granting agency, the agency turns it over to a board of experts for review, Lowman said.

Politics come into play during the review, Lowman said.

"People overestimate the degree to which politics are involved," he said.

One form of politics is the clash between competing theories in an academic field, Lowman said.

"People who are followers of one theoretical position may undervalue the research results based on another theory," he said.

Another factor in the review process, which may be considered political, is the familiarity faculty members have with the work of other researchers in their geographic region, especially on the East and West Coasts, Lowman said.

"Clearly, the primary consideration is in the quality of the idea," he said.

Based on that review, Lowman said, a decision is made to grant or not to grant funds for the project.

Matching the research proposal with an agency interested in that field of reseach is important, Lowman said.

"An agency will decline to fund research because it is not central to the mission of the agency," he said.

If a faculty member's proposal is rejected, the researcher must decide whether or not to revise the proposal based on the reviewers' critiques, Lowman said.

"People are more likely to get funding on the second time if they revise according to the criticisms," he said.

Flora said K-State is doing better in obtaining research funds.

Robert Kruh, dean of the Graduate School, said K-State researchers bring in millions of dollars each year.

"Our people are just bringing in millions and millions of dollars," he said.

During fiscal year 1988, K-State received about $29 million in research funds from outside sources. That figure continued a trend of increases in research monies obtained by faculty members. In fiscal year 1984, K-State received about $15 million in extramural funding.

Kruh said the University has a tripartite research structure. The Agricultural Experiment Station coordinates research for agriculture-related study areas and the Engineering Experiment Station does the same for engineering-related fields. The Bureau of General Research works with all other academic areas.

"You probably wouldn't design it this way if you started with a blank sheet — but it works. We've got good people," he said.

Many forget responsibility comes with voting

Commentary

DWAYNE LIVELY
Collegian Columnist

Tomorrow, at long last, all the mud-slinging and endless hours of commercials and all the political polls will culminate in an actual election. Finally, it will be time for U.S. citizens to do their part in the election process and exercise their right to vote.

Voting, however, is not the only responsibility the voters have in an election. Unfortunately, when voters don't fulfill their other obligations, their ability to make good decisions and their ability to vote suffers.

This presidential election has illustrated this beautifully. Voters are complaining that they are stuck with a choice between two candidates they don't like, George Bush and Michael Dukakis. Their campaigns have been a mess of mud-slinging and issue-avoiding. Nevertheless, even though no one likes either of them, one of them will be the next U.S. president.

The blame for this, however, rests with the voters. They have the power to set higher standards for politicians, but they settle for what they get, deciding between the "lesser of two evils" instead of standing up and demanding what they want.

The people who run the campaigns for Bush and Dukakis know how voters think, so they cater to them. The Bush campaign tries to trick voters into arguing over the importance of the Pledge of Allegiance, and Americans fall for it and stop asking about Bush's role in the Iran-Contra scandal. Dukakis attacks Dan Quayle's leadership ability and no longer has to answer questions about his own.

Bush gives speeches with Arnold Schwartzeneger and Chuck Norris standing next to him in order to convey a macho image. He then attacks Michael Dukakis for being "passionless." He seems to believe Americans want a macho fireball of a president. He may be right, and if we can believe the polls, he's going to win the election.

The Dukakis campaign was based on vagueness. The Democrats adopted a short, ambiguous platform. It made general statements about issues, offering little substance to support them. They tried to avoid words that voters might not like, especially the word "tax." The platform doesn't mention taxes.

Americans who feel a touch of moral indignation at such attempts to bamboozle their votes should remember that such campaigns have worked in the past. Ronald Reagan got elected in 1980 on an equally vague platform.

Why do Americans sit idly by and let politicians run campaigns like these? Are voters that apathetic? Sadly, they may be. The right to vote is fundamental to our system, but Americans have come to take it for granted. Sleazy campaigns and poor selection of candidates have not infuriated them into making changes; instead, it has turned them off to the election process. Many people don't bother to vote. Others are so wrapped up in their daily existence that they don't find or make time to vote. Still others believe that no matter who is president, he will be a crook "like all politicians are."

Modern Americans, unlike the early Americans who won this country's freedom, have evidently been conditioned not to act on their beliefs, at least not to the point where it might take too much effort. People who speak out too loudly are struck down or treated as fools.

If you want to witness this, watch how a crowd of K-State students treats one of the wandering evangelists who appear occasionally in front of the Union. There was one here last week, and it wasn't pretty.

Just by standing up and daring to speak, the evangelist was designated as too radical to be believed. People who hadn't even heard him speak were calling him "another Jesus freak." His arguments were struck down before he even opened his mouth. The groups on campus who protest CIA recruitment and aid to the Contras have received similar receptions. Here, like the rest of the country, to stand up and state what you believe is to risk being ignored and treated as a nut. Thus, few people stand up and make themselves heard.

Instead of speaking out, many Americans use their vote as their way of taking a stand for what they believe in. It's simple; it's quick; it's confidential and it doesn't interfere with watching "L.A. Law" or "ALF." After voting, they leave it to Congress and the president to solve the country's major problems — that's what we elect them for isn't it? — without ever getting involved. They still complain about government and governmental corruption, but by now they're so used to it that when a major scandal comes along, like the Iran-Contra or the Pentagon scandals, they brush it off as just another part of government and don't press their Congressmen to get with it and get to the bottom of it. Many believe their vote doesn't do any good anyway.

Votes do count. If they didn't, candidates wouldn't spend $20 million to win votes. The power of the voters is the ultimate power in the United States. No one gets to office except by the voters. The act of voting, therefore, demands a great deal of responsibility from the voter.

If people who don't vote suddenly had their right to vote taken away, you can bet they would rise up and demand their rights. Politics would suddenly become very important to them. Most of these same people, however, don't take the time to research issues or find out what the candidates believe. Some of them vote "straight ticket" because they believe that a party designation shows how a person thinks. The attitude "I'm a Republican/Democrat; he/she's a Republican/Democrat; we must think alike" prevails. These people are irresponsible voters, but they at least have an inkling of what a candidate might believe.

Unfortunately, a great many voters use the "nickel-flip" or the "eeny-meeny-miny-moe" systems of voting. They'll vote for anyone simply for the sake of completing the entire ballot. Otherwise, they don't feel they've fully exercised their right. These people epitomize irresponsibility and have no right to complain about what politicians do in while in office.

If citizens hope to keep the United States around for hundred or so more years, they must realize that the right to vote carries with it the responsibilty, not only to vote, but also to be informed on the country's problems. They also must realize that the act of voting is only a small part of what we call democracy, not democracy itself. Speaking and being able to speak your mind is also a part of democracy. The government doesn't have to oppress us if we already oppress ourselves.

New system decreases campus voter turnout

Americans simply do not vote. Students on the K-State campus are no exception.

In an effort to turn the trend around at K-State, the Student Governing Association's election committee added two new polling places, one in Derby Food Center and one in Cardwell Hall. These were in addition to the usual polling place in the Union.

The idea was simple. Although the Union is the center of campus activity, it is not the geographic center, and any polling place there was believed to reflect this. So the committee decided to offset the Union's geographic handicap with two new, strategically located polling places.

It was worth a try, but it failed.

K-State's fall enrollment increased by 1,300 students, yet 2,543 students voted in the election Tuesday, compared to 2,563 students just one year ago. That's 20 fewer votes.

Most likely the problem is not the location of the polling places, but rather the requirement for voting. This year, students had to have a fee card in order to vote — something most people simply do not carry with them.

So although chances are greater that students may run across a polling place during the course of their day, it won't do them any good if they don't have a fee card.

The plan had good intentions, but the facts speak for themselves. Requiring voters to present a fee card hurts rather than helps the election process.

College put in perspective

LENORE STUMPF
Guest Columnist

When I decided to start taking classes at K-State again this fall, I didn't stop to think about the fact that the closest thing to a desk I would have would be my car out in a parking lot six blocks away. It doesn't make for easy management of the objects one needs for each school day.

It takes a lot of energy to go back to school. The brain cells that have atrophied through the years complain about being expected to function again. The muscles, which supported nothing but the body and perhaps a child or grandchild perched on the hip, balk at the notion of packing around a heavy book bag.

School books for college classes tend to be pretty hefty, especially those that have 1,500 pages and should have come equipped with wheels, but don't. A couple of those, plus notebooks and other assorted items, add up to quite a pack.

A college campus is always such a stimulating place. I like to watch those enthusiastic, talented students and imagine the ways in which they will make their mark on the world. As they work toward degrees in literature, science, math, music, physics, agriculture, engineering and dozens of other subjects, it is easy to see that the country will be a better place for their having been a part of it.

So many area high school students go on to college anymore that it's unlikely I will spend a day on campus without seeing a familiar face or two, including that of my youngest son, Roger, a K-State freshman.

Enrollment at K-State continues to increase, a testimony to the intelligence of those young students, and to the high-quality education that has been provided for them by local schools.

I personally, am thinking of getting a golf cart to haul my books around in. Either that, or I'll leave the academics to the younger generation and taking up playing golf.

Collegian Editorial Policies

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR are always encouraged. Those which pertain to matters of campus and/or public interest are especially encouraged, and are given the highest priority.

Letters should be kept as brief as possible, preferably under 300 words. Those who cannot condense their opinions should consider submiting their letter in the form of a guest column. All letters are subject to editing for space, style and taste.

GUEST COLUMNS are also encouraged. The column should be no longer than two double-spaced, typed pages. If the submission is used as a column and not a letter to the editor, it will be accompanied by the author's photograph.

SEND SUBMISSIONS to the Collegian in Kedzie 116.

UNSIGNED EDITORIALS represent the consensus opinion of the Collegian's editorial board. Opinion columns do not necessarily reflect the opinions of the Collegian management, Student Publications, Inc. or the newspaper staff in general.

Llewelyn ad wrong

Editor,

Re: the advertisement by student body presidential candidate J.D. Llewelyn in the Oct. 27 Collegian. Llewelyn has leveled serious charges against the Collegian to which I feel compelled to respond. In his ad, Llewelyn states that Pat Muir, 1987 student body presidential candidate, was "ruined" by a "smear" campaign undertaken by the Collegian. I was editor of the Collegian when this alleged maligning took place, and I can assure Llewelyn and everyone else at K-State that his charges are absolutely false. Allow me to address some specific "facts" listed by Llewelyn in his ad.

First, he asserts that Muir was the leading candidate at the time the Collegian ran a story critical of ads of Muir had placed in the newspaper. I don't remember any evidence that Muir was the leader, and I seriously doubt that Llewelyn can produce any.

Second, Llewelyn states that the story about Muir is untrue. I hope Mike Kadel, Eirene Tatham and John Bullock enjoy being called liars. All were quoted as never having given permission for Muir to use their names as "supporters" of Muir in his ad, which was the legitimate premise of the story.

Third, Llewelyn says the Collegian accomplished what it had set out to do: "ruin" Muir. Nothing is further from the truth. To enlighten Llewelyn, here's how the story came about: An individual upset that his name had been used in Muir's ad came into the newsroom on his own and aired his complaint. The Collegian staff then decided it was a newsworthy story. Incidentally, on that same day, the managing editor, news editor, special projects editor, one campus editor, agri/business editor, features editor, arts and entertainment editor and I were in St. Louis at a journalism convention. Do you still wish to assert the Muir story was a collaborative effort to ruin him, Mr. Llewelyn?

Finally, I stood behind the story at the time and still do. It was an informative and telling story, and I would hope the Collegian would run one like it again under similar circumstances. Furthermore, believe me, Mr. Llewelyn: Collegian staffers have much more important things to do than sit around and plot who they're going to "get" next.

Please don't humble yourself by thinking that the nasty Collegian is going to ruin you. From where I sit, you're doing a fine job of that by yourself.

Pageant successful

Editor,

I would like to thank all of the individuals who made the 1988-89 Mr. and Ms. Black Student Union Pageant a success. Among those are: Diana Caldwell, Mr. and Mrs. McGowan, Crystal Davis and the president of BSU, who wishes to remain anonymous.

The pageant flowed beautifully from beginning to end, making the selection process a difficult task. I extend warm congratulations to Mr. BSU Mark Mahan and Ms. BSU Cassondra Redman. I would also like to congratulate the lovely and intelligent (a rare combination) Ms. BSU runner-up Kim Jackson and Mr. BSU runner-up Tyrone D. Lockhart. Kim's sisters, who supported her 100 percent, also deserve thanks.

There is, however, one particular thing about the pageant that saddened my heart — the number of empty seats during the pageant. To all of the so-called members of BSU who decided not to attend, you definitely missed an exciting evening. I wish I could manufacture crutches for all the lame excuses you'll give.

Campus police help

Editor,

On Oct. 25, I unfortunately allowed my car to empty its tank of gas. It happened to be midnight and I was headed home from work. I walked to the nearest phone and I called Campus Police. Officer Rich Howard offered to send someone to help. Officer Gillespie was the lucky person. He was very helpful. He gave me a ride to a gas station to get some gas.

He then brought me back to my car and put the gas in the tank and waited to see if the car would start. He then followed me back to the gas station to make sure I got there without any more hitches. I was greatly appreciative of their help, as it was getting cold and was midnight and I wasn't looking forward to walking home. Again, thank you for your help and consideration. Captain Beckom, you have at least two fine officers on your staff and I am happy to be the person to let you know.

Don't have to vote

Editor,

I am submitting this for inclusion on your editorial page.

Vote, vote, vote. We hear this a lot, especially with the presidential election almost here. I disagree with the push of these commercials.

If a person is involved and knowledgeable in politics they will vote without an ad.

If you don't know the issues, or if you don't know the candidates and what they stand for, you should be ashamed of yourself for voting.

Voting is not for giving a sense of satisfaction to the citizen who votes; it for electing leaders to make rational decisions to govern our country. So let's not reduce our vote to an irrational action that is forced upon us by a feeling of guilt for not doing our duty as an American.

Bad endorsement

Editor,

In your stated support of Gov. Michael Dukakis for president, you noted his perceived role in shaping the Supreme Court as being a strong asset. In addition, you said privacy rights would be stripped under the original intent doctrine.

On the contrary, the role of original intent and jurisprudence ensures that individual rights will be protected from a centralized state. Just examine what comes about when the courts violate original intent: eradication of church from state (instead of simply forbidding a state religion), legalized abortion, illegal prayer in schools and unnecessarily restricting effective law enforcement (as in Miranda, 1966).

Also, when the courts usurp the power to place its agenda into law (a violation of the separation of powers doctrine), it is easy to see that not following original intent leads to the trampling of privacy rights.

Story irresponsible

Editor,

I am very concerned about the front-page article in the Thursday, Nov. 3 edition regarding the student body presidential candidates.

The election of the student body president is important to every student at K-State. All of us are affected and hopefully as we realize that fact, all will take the time to vote for the candidate that best represents the beliefs she or he values. The primary source, and in some cases the only available source, for discovering the positions of our candidates is the Collegian. I would hope the Collegian staff would take that responsibility seriously and give equal time and coverage to both candidates.

Based on Thursday's article, I think it is safe to say that equal coverage was not a priority of the Collegian. Not only was McIntyre's photo significantly larger — perhaps that was a decision of artistic license, but the readers were saturated with quotes from McIntyre and his staff, while little attention was given to Cuffy. News of McIntyre began and ended the article while the token coverage afforded Cuffy was not only minimal but lacked the substance typical of his campaign.

I am not suggesting this partiality was intentional by any means, but it was irresponsible. The Collegian plays a critical role in campus elections. I would appreciate a greater commitment to fulfilling the function as an impartial news source from our Collegian staff.

KU deserves it

Editor,

The article "Brown leaves town; Kansas takes blame" in the Wednesday issue of the Collegian left me with tears running down my "disgraced" face. HA-HA! Hearing of KU's bustation made me stridulate with waves of pure joy and laughter.

I think that it was great that a team from Kansas won the NCAA Championship, but hell, they broke the rules and anyway ... this is KU we're talking about. A punishment like the one Lawrence got in "The Day After" would be much more to my liking than the weak penalties they received.

As for Larry Brown, I'm sure he's down in Texas, living the good life, passing out many jars of Grey Poupon from the back seat of his limo. I don't like Larry, but I have to salute him for leaving KU like a carcass on the side of the road.

Article lacking

Editor,

We appreciate the coverage given to the recent meeting of the KSU Preservation Society, but wish to make a correction. Some of the information in the article was never mentioned at the meeting. A letter we had circulated earlier failed to emphasize that current plans are subject to change. When proposals are completed, Larry Garvin, director of Facilities Planning, will initiate discussions with the campus community.

American policy ignores basic human rights

"Nicaragua and other countries should be free — free to do what we want them to do; they should choose their own source independently, as long as their choice conforms to U.S. interests. If they use the freedom we accord them unwisely, naturally we must respond in self-defense."

— Noam Chomsky

If you are familiar with Noam Chomsky's work, you will recognize that the above quote is sarcastic (from Chomsky's point of view, that is). But, unfortuneately, this outlandish message is accurate if attributed to the makers of U.S. foreign policy. The "democracy" that the Reagan administration claims to be fostering in Central America turns out to be little more than harnessing the little dogs in our backyard with as short a chain as possible. The Reagan administration's "fledgling democracies" of Guatemala, El Salvador and Honduras are all ruled basically by their military forces. The official civilian regimes have as little as 20 percent or 30 percent of the power, as attested by countless reports of torture, disappearances and outright genocide committed against the civilian populations.

But such is the cost of stabilization and saving the world from communism, at least in the eyes of our leaders. In her famous essay "Dictatorships and Double Standards," former U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Jean Kirkpatrick states plainly and unabashedly that such brutality, as long as it is committed by regimes which are anti-communist, is acceptable. Kirkpatrick was offered the position at the United Nations by Reagan out of his admiration for her views.

The Reagan administration's systematic hypocrism in its relationships with tyrannies throughout the world is blatant. Reagan has vetoed sanctions against South Africa, where white minority rule keeps blacks in social slavery.

There was Somoza in Nicaragua, Marcos in the Philippines and Duvalier in Haiti — all of whom fled their countries in Air Force jets, taking with them large parts of their countries' treasuries. In Haiti, the despotic military rule of Henri Namphy forced itself into power after a shaky stint of civilian rule by President Leslie Maginat. Of this oppressive and corrupt regime, a U.S. government official told Newsweek, "We're going to have to live with this bunch down there and accept it with a mixture of disgust and disdain, whatever they put in place." The Namphy government has since been ousted. Nonetheless, the Reagan administration is on record with its tolerance of Namphy's bloody rule.

Commentary

KALE BALDOCK
Guest Columnist

As for the fledgling democracies of Guatemala, El Salvador and Honduras, the dogma of Kirkpatrick seems to be the stand that the U.S. has consistently taken. It seems to be OK for the Guatemalan armed forces to systematically eliminate its native population in the name of fighting communism. It seems to be OK for Salvadoran armed forces to bomb peasants in the countryside in the name of fighting communism. It seems OK for 55,000 U.S. troops to destroy farmland in its maneuvers in Honduras and for Nicaraguan Contras to drive people off their land, all in the name of fighting communism.

As for attempts to work out their problems politically rather than militarily, these three Central American nations have the worst record in the region. The signing of a Central American peace accord in August 1987 by the presidents of Guatemala, El Salvador, Honduras, Nicaragua and Costa Rica gave each nation the chance to try diplomacy in their disputes. The hope for peace was higher than ever. Although all of the countries probably could have done more to advance the peace process, it was Guatemala, El Salvador and Honduras who either failed miserably or simply didn't seriously attempt negotiations. A study done by the Latin American Studies Association with the help of K-State professor Jan Flora and University of Kansas professor Charles Stansifer concludes that of the five Central American nations, Nicaragua took many more serious steps to work out its conflicts peacefully.

It is useful to compare the three nations I have singled out with Nicaragua, which has for the past nine years been under the world's microscope. Conservatives see Nicaragua as "totalitarian" for such actions as closing down a major opposition newspaper and radio station in a time of war, without regard to the fact that the U.S. did as much and more to quell dissent during wartime. I do not necessarily condone such actions on behalf of any country, but I find it infuriating that no one seems to consider the kinds of action that the Guatemalan, Salvadoran and Honduran regimes do not prevent. This is either due to their weakness in the face of military domination or to their willingness to take part in these actions. When one considers death squad activity resulting in the accumulation of bodies at a regular dumping site, people disappearing or showing up on a roadside so mangled from torture that their bodies are unrecognizable, the closing down of a newspaper and a radio station doesn't seem radically worse.

With all we hear from the Reagan propaganda machine about Nicaragua, Nicaragua, Nicaragua, why don't we hear more about Guatemala, El Salvador and Honduras? They're Central American countries too. If we are truly a people concerned with justice and human rights — as we take for granted we are — we should get to the bottom of the matter and hold our elected government accountable to us, unless we aren't concerned with justice and human rights. In that case, never mind.

Wefald speaks to agriculture class

By Amy Lyons
Collegian Reporter

Women looking for careers in agriculture need to be open-minded and do what interests them, said Ruth Ann Wefald and a panel of four female faculty in the College of Agriculture.

Wefald said her background prior to moving to Manhattan enabled her to discuss current issues and the role of women in agriculture with the freshman agriculture orientation class.

While her husband was the president of Southwest State University in Minnesota, Wefald became involved with a rural study group interested in the economic status of rural women.

"A group of us decided that it wasn't enough to just study something ... so we started a women's career counseling center that assisted people — both men and women — with their job search and skill enhancement," Wefald said.

As the executive director of the counseling center, Wefald put together a broad-based advisory committee and wrote a preliminary needs-assessment survey to address the concerns of women in the area. The survey results set the basis for the program.

David Mugler, director of resident instruction for the College of Agriculture and proctor of the agriculture orientation class, said Wefald approached him, wanting to speak to students in the college.

"She called me last spring and said she had some interesting things to share with students. Her background truly does lend itself to the sharing of this information," he said.

Wefald said she realized some of the problems facing those in agriculture and wanted to share some of her knowledge with both males and females in the college.

"I feel it is important for the males, too, but especially the females, to hear what's really available to them," she said. "They (women in agriculture) are traditionally an overlooked group."

Wefald encouraged women in college to "think more broadly about careers" and to consider all areas that interest them. People need to be open-minded to adjust to the world's pressures, she said.

"The fact is, most of you will work outside the home," Wefald said. "A female born in 1970 will spend an estimated 22.9 years in the job market. With figures like this, you need to be doing something that you enjoy and are good at."

Wefald listed four areas everyone seeking a job should address and consider — training, flexibility, networking and building a support group.

"Networking is getting out and talking to people and letting them know you are interested in a job," Wefald said. "In one study, 48 percent of the people who got a job said they got it through connections made while networking."

Support groups help job-seekers maintain self-respect and goal clarity, she said.

"As we go into fields that are non-traditional," she said, "such as women in agriculture, it is important to try and surround ourselves with a group of people that will build us up and tell us 'you can do this,' so our enthusiasm stays high."

"Your support group can be family or friends, but whoever it is, don't let them sway you from your goals," Wefald said.

The panelists agreed the agricultural job search was tougher for women as a rule, but none regretted her career choice.

"I'm not here because I have to be, I'm in agriculture because I want to be," said Jan Leach, assistant professor of plant pathology.

Leach emphasized that change, in a career or in a major in school, is OK as long as the individual is happy.

Paula Bramel-Cox, assistant professor of agronomy, advised students to take on-campus jobs to research areas of interest and challenge themselves in class.

Bramel-Cox advised students against taking the "easy way out" of course work.

"You'll only close doors to yourself," she said. "Take course work which allows you some flexibility as well as a challenge."

Reinee Hildebrandt, assistant professor of forestry, shared tips on taking advice from others and encouraged students to get involved in professional organizations, departmental clubs and jobs while on campus.

"Look for opportunities to reach out and always promote yourself as a unique individual," Hildebrandt said.

Write-in candidate faces challenges

By Brenda Birt
Collegian Reporter

Offering voters an alternative, Stan Eckert is running as a write-in candidate for Kansas' 2nd District seat in the U.S. House of Representatives.

Eckert lost the GOP nomination for the seat to Phil Meinhardt, who will be running against Democratic incumbent Jim Slattery.

"I am back in the race because I think people need the choice," Eckert said. "I think Phil Meinhardt is a lackluster candidate; he doesn't know what's facing Northeastern Kansas. The fact that I've lived in the district for 10 years makes me a better candidate."

Although he said he feels confident about his abilities, Eckert knows he is handicapped by running as a write-in candidate.

"I know write-ins are fairly difficult, but I don't think I'd do it if I didn't have some chance of winning," he said. "The thinking person will vote for me as an alternative to Slattery."

One of the issues that brought Eckert back into the race is governmental support for farms. He said he believes farms should be independent of government support, except under certain conditions.

"This drought has come at a bad time. Under the circumstances, I have to support some type of government assistance," he said.

His long-term goal is to phase out government assistance so farmers are independently stable.

Political parties beginning 1-day countdown

Presidential candidates claim last-minute momentum gain

By The Associated Press

George Bush and Michael Dukakis both laid claim Sunday to precious, last-minute momentum in their campaign marathon, the vice president declaring the tide was "moving in our direction" and the combative underdog insisting he was "rocking and rolling" to an election upset Tuesday.

The political equivalent of a nuclear exchange occurred on television, where the Republicans and Democrats spent millions of dollars in advertising for the waning hours of the campaign. The two candidates bought time for 30-minute commercials on all three major networks for election eve on Monday.

Although national polls pointed to a victory by GOP nominee Bush, both candidates battled the clock and physical exhaustion in a final drive to snare undecided voters and nail down the presidency.

NBC News said Bush led nationally by five percentage points, and that one of every five voters were undecided or might switch allegiance.

"There ain't no stopping us now unless we stop ourselves," the vice president said at a breakfast rally in Colorado Springs, Colo.

"We can't turn the White House over to the people who claim to be on our side but who left the country on its back," Bush said.

Countered Dukakis, also beginning his day in Colorado: "He's slipping and sliding, we're rocking and rolling." He sought to raise fears over the possibility that Bush — if elected — might put vice presidential running mate Dan Quayle in charge of the White House crisis management team.

"Gives you the chills, doesn't it?" Dukakis asked. "Think about it — the Cuban missile crisis, with Dan Quayle in charge."

Democrats voiced confidence they would retain or perhaps widen their majorities in the House and Senate in Tuesday's balloting, and they got little dissent from Republicans on that score.

Democrats also hoped for modest gains among the 12 statehouse races on the ballot.

It was the costliest campaign in American history, and just one piece of it, a series of California ballot initiatives, had a price tag of more than $100 million.

Bush aide Alixe Glen described the vice president's rapidly changing itinerary as a "Magical Mystery Tour." Dukakis tried to defy the clock and was flying overnight from Spokane to Cleveland and then St. Louis — and then back to the West Coast for a noon rally Monday.

A series of state polls provided a picture of several close races. One poll gave Bush a 17-point lead in Texas, with its 29 electoral votes. But Dukakis was reported gaining on Bush in the latest survey in Colorado, and holding an eight-point lead in Iowa.

Senate sway not expected

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — There is an unusual unanimity this year about prospects for the Senate in Tuesday's balloting: Democrats will remain in control, and may well increase their eight-seat advantage.

"The Democrats will hold onto 54 seats at a minimum, and I believe have a very good opportunity to add," said Sen. John Kerry of Massachusetts, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

"We realize it's still quite volatile out there," said Tom Mason, spokesman for the National Republican Senatorial Committee. "We could end up on Election Day minus two. But we could just as easily be plus two or better."

One reason little change is expected is that, unlike some past presidential elections, there has been no overriding national theme dictated by the top of the ticket, the kind of compelling issue that would propel voters to seek massive changes.

Rather, polls have show a general contentment with the status quo, and that works to the benefit of incumbents.

That advantage extends to the House, where very little movement is expected in the Democrats' 255-177 majority.

"There isn't the thematic difference" that has pervaded presidential contests in the past, Mason said. "President Reagan said it best: We are the change. It's not as clear a mandate as in 1980, when there was such a screaming need for change."

That was the year Republicans rode Reagan's coattails to a 12-seat pickup and control of the Senate for the first time in a quarter-century. In 1986, an eight-seat gain enabled Democrats to retake control.

This time, Republican George Bush and Democrat Michael Dukakis have been criticized for running a race devoid of issues, devoted mostly to personal attacks and distortions of each other's records.

So issues in this year's Senate campaign have been largely drawn from a list of topics that Democrats claim as their own, although they have been used by candidates of both parties: the environment, education, Social Security, health care and "family issues" like child care.

Also prominent in Senate stump speeches and advertising have been the problems of drugs and crime.

Most Senate incumbents of both parties appeared likely to win reelection on Tuesday, but there were several prominent exceptions.

Analysts said Republican Sen. David Karnes, who was appointed in 1987 to fill an unexpired Nebraska Senate term, was the most likely to be ousted. Democratic former Gov. Bob Kerrey, a popular figure, held a heavy lead in polls.

KU ground game too much for K-State

'Hawks pound out 344 yards rushing

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

LAWRENCE — The K-State Wildcats looked like they were stuck in low gear for the first half of their 30-12 loss at the hands of the University of Kansas Jayhawks in Saturday's game at Memorial Stadium, extending their non-winning streak to 25 games.

The 'Hawks, who ended their non-winning streak at 15 games, scored on three of their first four possessions and held on to claim the victory over their intrastate rivals.

"We didn't make plays and they did. We looked half a step slow throughout the entire first half and I don't know why. They just beat us, straight up and fair and square."
—Stan Parrish
K-State coach

"The first half was a nightmare," said K-State coach Stan Parrish. "We didn't make plays and they did. We looked half a step slow throughout the entire first half and I don't know why. They just beat us, straight up and fair and square. They just beat us.

"They did a good job of executing today and we didn't. They gave us a good, old-fashioned whipping."

Kansas was aided early in the game by two interceptions.

Immediately following the Jayhawks' initial 80-yard touchdown drive, the 'Cats drove the ball from their own 27-yard line to the KU eight, where they had first and goal. But the drive was halted when a Carl Straw pass was intercepted in the end zone by Kansas defensive back Jason Priest.

"The real crucial mistakes for us were the interceptions," Parrish said. "On the first one, we were going in (for a score). After the first interception, we still thought we could win, but the second (interception) was a real killer.

"Carl just didn't have a big day for us today and that was essential for us. They didn't ask their guy to do as much and he did a good job for them."

"After the first touchdown we thought, 'no big deal,'" said K-State linebacker Maurice Henry. "After the second, we figured we could still come back, but, when they scored again, it put a damper on things.

"We're the type of team that can bounce back, but this is a hard one to bounce back from."

Kansas was able to score following its first interception, giving them a 14-0 first-quarter lead.

Most of the damage done by the Jayhawk offense was accomplished in the first half. The 'Hawks were able to score another touchdown midway through the second period on a five play, 28-yard drive, and then KU place-kicker Brad Fleeman connected on a 54-yard field goal with five seconds left in the half to give the 'Hawks a 24-0 halftime lead.

After the intermission, K-State looked like a different team defensively. The 'Cats defense shut down the KU offense on its first five possessions of the second half, forcing the Jayhawks to punt the ball three times and to give the ball up on downs twice.

The Wildcat offense scored on its first two possessions of the second half, but settled for field goals instead of touchdowns. Place-kicker Mark Porter connected on kicks of 24 and 37 yards to bring the score to 24-6.

The first K-State field goal came after the 'Cats were only able to pick up four yards on third down and seven from the Jayhawk 11-yard line. The 'Cats were facing a fourth down with three yards to go for the first when they opted to try for the three points.

The last two scores of the game were inconsequential. Kansas scored on a one-yard plunge by tailback Tony Sands with 3:21 left remaining to make the score 30-6. K-State then took the kickoff and drove the ball 69 yards in seven plays with Straw connecting on a 13-yard scoring strike to Greg Washington to put the final tally at 30-12.

Although the 'Cats were unable to win, some personal bests and records came out of their efforts.

Porter tied the record for number of field goals made in a season and also tied the mark for career field goals, with 11 and 37, respectively. Wide receiver Greg Washington's seven receptions broke a K-State record for most receptions in a season with 59. He also padded his previous season records for receiving yardage (772) and touchdown catches (eight).

Tailback Tom Dillon had his best day ever as a 'Cat, rushing 12 times for 68 yards and pulling in eight receptions for 47 yards. Fullback Lee Pickett's 77 yards rushing gives him 573 yards for the season, the first time that a K-State fullback has rushed for over 500 yards since Masi Toluao rushed for 531 in 1981.

"I really think our team was tired today," Parrish said. "We were physically worn down. We were playing (in Lawrence) and that's something you have to take away early in the game and we just didn't do that.

"We weren't on top of our game today at all. We just weren't clicking. They played very hard and seized the momentum."

K-State quarterback Carl Straw is dropped for a five-yard loss by University of Kansas players Dan Newbrough and John Fritch in the third quarter of Saturday's game in Lawrence. The 'Cats loss to the Jayhawks is their 25th straight, the NCAA's longest non-winning streak.

Dropped pass haunts Cowboys

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — What happened to Brent Parker of Oklahoma State Saturday would make a good script for a Hollywood movie.

In fact, it already did. A few years ago Robin Williams and Kurt Russell starred in "The Best of Times," in which a middle-aged businessman is haunted by a touchdown pass he dropped in a high school game years many before.

In the movie, Williams organizes a rematch and redeems himself by making a circus, game-winning catch of Russell's touchdown pass.

But alas for Parker, that was Hollywood and this is real life. There will be no rematch. There will be no chance to atone for the perfectly thrown pass which he dropped in the end zone on fourth down in the final seconds of Oklahoma's 31-28 victory.

"I saw it real well," Parker said. "He (defensive back Kevin Thompson) didn't get a hand on the ball. I just took my eye off it. It was a great throw."

7th-ranked Nebraska matched Oklahoma's 5-0 conference mark with a 51-16 rout of Iowa State. If Oklahoma beats Missouri this week and Nebraska gets past Colorado, the Big Reds will settle the championship and the Orange Bowl bid the next week in Norman, Okla.

Elsewhere in the Big Eight Saturday, Colorado rolled over Missouri 45-8.

Oklahoma State's trio of wide receiver Hart Lee Dykes, quarterback Mike Gundy and running back Barry Sanders put up a memorable fight against the Sooners. Sanders, the nation's leading rusher, had 215 yards and the go-ahead touchdown late in the fourth quarter. Dykes, the all-time leading receiver in the Big Eight, caught nine passes for 123 yards. And Gundy hit 18 of 28 passes for 228 yards.

But Oklahoma freshman Mike Gaddis rushed for 213 yards and quarterback Charles Thompson scored the winning touchdown on an 18-yard run that capped an 80-play drive with 2:33 remaining.

K-State tailback Tom Dillon is hit by KU defensive back Tim Hill. Dillon had a career-high 68 yards rushing.

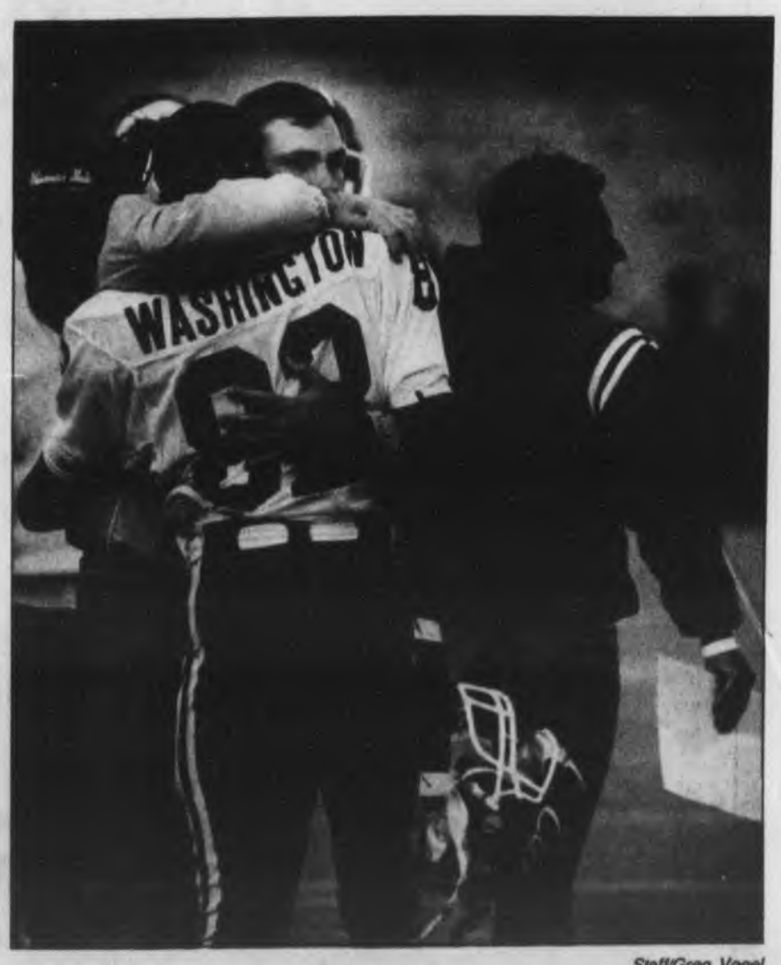
Dillon has best day as Wildcat

By Mike Rouse
Sports Writer

When Tom Dillon began the season, he set a goal of scoring a touchdown in each of the K-State football games this year. So far, the season has provided nothing of the sort for Dillon.

Dillon has yet to score a touchdown this season, but has contributed to the team in other ways. Besides being a running back, he catches passes and also returns kickoffs.

"I had a goal at the begining of the season to score a touchdown in every game and I haven't even scored one yet," Dillon said.



In the 30-12 loss to the University of Kansas on Saturday, Dillon showed his talent by executing well while both running and receiving the football. The Manhattan native carried the ball 12 times for 68 yards and caught eight passes for 47 yards.

"I was happy about being able to run the ball. I knew the coaches have confidence in me," he said. "It feels real good to touch the ball, but the offensive line gets a lot of credit."

Dillon felt good about how well the K-State offense controlled the line of scrimmage and credited the line for why the 'Cats were able to pick up yards on the ground and in the air. K-State had 168 yards rushing and 194 yards passing.

"The line moved them back and we were able to pick up five to six yards every time on the fullback sweep," Dillon said. "I feel good about my day and the whole offense, I thought we performed allright. It is just disappointing that we couldn't put the ball in the end zone."

For the season, Dillon has 161 yards on 29 carries. Dillon also has 159 yards receiving on 22 catches and is third on the team in all-purpose yards, averaging nearly 70 yards per game.

Wrestling promoter moves into boxing

When Sugar Ray Leonard and Donny Lelonde square off tonight in Caesars Palace in Las Vegas, Nev., one of the most important persons behind the scenes will be a pro wrestling promoter.

Wait a minute. Ray Leonard and Donny Lelonde are pro boxers, not pro wrestlers, right? So what's a pro wrestling promoter doing behind the scenes at a pro boxing unification match?

Hopefully helping to pump some new blood into a sport that's really struggling. That's what.

The promoter's name is Vince McMahon Jr., and if you've ever turned on your TV set on virtually any day of the week and seen the likes of Hulk Hogan, Macho Man Savage and Andre the Giant, you've seen the product of McMahon's rapid rise to the top of his profession.

McMahon, whose father was a boxing and wrestling promoter in New York state before his death, is the owner of Titan Sports, the parent company of the World Wrestling Federation.

The WWF is the premier organization in pro wrestling, and it's not just because the WWF has the major stars in the business. It's because McMahon and those he's assembled around him have a knack for packaging pro wrestling in a way that makes it "hip" to be seen in the crowd at a pro wrestling match.

McMahon's concept, and one that's revitalized pro wrestling, is to offer an evening of entertainment to those who attend WWF matches. The early slogan of the WWF — "the recognized symbol of excellence in sports entertainment" — maximized the use of the word "entertainment,"

Svoboda on Sports

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Columnist

and still does today.

One of the ways McMahon presented his unique brand of entertainment to the public, and one that he still uses extremely well, is via the "pay-per-view" process.

This process involves the viewer paying a charge for the right to view an event in the comfort of the viewer's own home. A device that unscrambles the signal for the pay-per-view station, much like your cable "box" might do if you have a premium service, is all you need, and you have a night of entertainment at your fingertips.

Unfortunately, the Manhattan area has yet to benefit from the wonders of pay-per-view. If you wanted to see any of McMahon's "Wrestlemania" or "Survivor Series" extravaganzas, you had to go elsewhere.

The same is the case for tonight's Leonard-Lelonde match, of which Titan Sports is responsible for the pay-per-view coverage.

That's right. The world of pro wrestling has met the world of pro boxing — again. And it may be a marriage made in heaven.

Boxing is in a bit of a stagnant period. There are more titles than legitimate boxers, it seems, and more drama takes place in divorce court and involving retirement announcements than in the ring itself.

McMahon may just make it "chic" to be seen at ringside of a fight again, and if he does, his entrance into boxing via the pay-per-view venue will benefit the sport immeasurably.

If you've tuned in the WWF recently, you've no doubt seen a proliferation of ads for the Leonard-Lelonde match. It's this marketing strategy that's made McMahon's pay-per-view wrestling cards successful.

Every bit of time you've viewed WWF action in the past few weeks and haven't been hit by a myriad of Leonard-Lelonde announcements, you've been hit with a myriad of announcements for the Survivor Series, the WWF's Thanksgiving pay-per-view event.

If you watch the WWF, you're exposed to the commercials within the program. In reality, that's all television wrestling is today — an hour-long commercial for pay-per-view events or an attempt to lure the viewer to live events.

If McMahon is successful tonight, maybe we'll see a weekly boxing program that will combine the best in boxing with the best in entertainment. This isn't hoping that boxing will become the theatrical spectacle wrestling is and always has been, but even athletics in their purest form can use a shot in the arm every now and then.

The Major Indoor Soccer League is still alive because of this formula of combining sports and entertainment. It works.

That's what Leonard, Lelonde and McMahon are betting on. It's a bet I hope they win, for the sake of boxing and the sake of the true boxing fan.

Chiefs fall to Denver; Bears, Bengals move to 8-2

Turnovers doom Kansas City; Broncos tied for first in West

By The Associated Press

DENVER — There was nothing particularly artistic about it, but coming on the heels of 39-21 and 55-23 blowout losses as it did, you could excuse Denver Broncos Coach Dan Reeves for viewing it as a thing of beauty.

His Broncos overcame some costly penalties and occasionally ragged play to defeat the turnover-prone Kansas City Chiefs 17-11 Sunday.

"We played hard, we hustled and we avoided the turnovers that can hurt you," Reeves said. "I felt we took a step in the right direction today.

"Right now, we're tied for first in the division. We've got a long way to go, but if we can get the execution from our players we did today, we'll be all right."

The Broncos climbed into a first-place tie in the AFC West with Seattle at 5-5. Kansas City, whose only previous victory this season came over Denver, dropped to 1-8-1.

John Elway threw a 6-yard touchdown pass to Vance Johnson, and Sammy Winder added another score on a short-yardage run to pace Denver.

Elway said Denver's two recent setbacks — only one of which he had a hand in — caused him to doubt himself.

"I was probably more nervous before this game than I was before our two Super Bowls because we are not sky-high on confidence," he said. "My confidence was probably at an all-time low before this game. Everyone was kind of in shock.

"It was good to get that passing game going again. We're getting that feeling back."

Kansas City Coach Frank Gansz said the Chiefs "had our opportunities, but we didn't take advantage of them. Ball security — that's what cost us the game. We gave them seven points. You can't expect to win when you have good field position and don't take care of the ball."

On two occasions, the Chiefs drove inside the Denver 10-yard line but came away with no points. With a second-and-goal at Denver's 8 in the first quarter, Bill Kenney threw into coverage and was intercepted at the goalline by Denver safety Mike Harden.

Harden was downed at the 1, and Kansas City managed to get a safety on the next play when Tony Dorsett was tackled on a pitchout in the end zone by linebacker Dino Hackett.

The Chiefs squandered their other scoring opportunity early in the third period. With second-and-six from the 8, Paul Palmer took a pitchout, slipped and fumbled the ball away to linebacker Rick Dennison.

Elway's TD pass and Winder's run staked the Broncos to a 14-2 lead, which the Chiefs whittled to 14-5 at the half on the first of three Nick Lowery field goals.

Kansas City got within 14-8 with a third-quarter field goal, but the two teams traded final-period kicks.

The safety came on Denver's first play from scrimmage, from the 1 following Harden's interception. Dorsett, lined up unusually deep in the end zone, took a pitchout to the right and was dumped by Hackett for a loss.

Denver then countered with three drives, two of which resulted in TDs.

On a 71-yard scoring drive, Elway passed 24 yards to Johnson before hitting the leaping receiver for the score.

Moments later, Ricky Nattiel returned a punt 24 yards just past midfield, but a personal-foul penalty set Denver back at its own 24.

It was the first of five Denver penalties for 50 yards on the ensuing drive. The Broncos managed to reach the Kansas City 8, but Elway's arm was hit while throwing by Angelo Snipes and Mike Stensrud intercepted.

Three plays later, Stephone Paige caught a pass from Kenney but fumbled when hit by Dennis Smith, and Denver's Randy Robbins recovered at the Chiefs' 21. Winder scored from the 1 moments later.

Denver's Mike Horan shanked a punt that traveled only 19 yards early in the third period, giving Kansas City possession at the Denver 34. But Palmer's fumble killed that drive.

Ditka watches from hospital as Bears defeat Tampa Bay

By The Associated Press

While Mike Ditka sat in a hospital room and watched on television, his Chicago Bears made him feel pretty good.

Ditka, who suffered a mild heart attack Wednesday, watched with his wife and a doctor at Lake Forest Hospital on Sunday and he had to like what he saw as the Bears beat Tampa Bay 28-10.

"I think it would have been harder on him not to watch the game," said his wife Diana. "That would be more stress."

The game was a good test for Mike Tomczak, who once again replaced an injured Jim McMahon at quarterback. Tomczak, often the subject of Ditka tirades on the sidelines, completed 18 of 26 passes for 269 yards and upped his record to 12-2 as a replacement starter for McMahon.

"I played within my limitations," Tomczak said. "The offense put some points on the board and we broke the third-quarter jinx."

Dennis McKinnon caught four passes for 87 yards. Two of them set up one-yard touchdown runs by Thomas Sanders and Neal Anderson.

Chicago, 8-2, also clamped down on Tampa Bay quarterback Vinny Testaverde. The Bears intercepted two passes and sacked him twice for 32 yards.

Elsewhere Sunday, Cincinnati also moved to 8-2 with a 42-7 thrashing of Pittsburgh. It was Philadelphia 30, the Los Angeles Rams 24; New England 21, Miami 10; the New York Giants 29, Dallas 21; Minnesota 44, Detroit 17; and Atlanta 20, Green Bay 0, Phoenix 24, San Francisco 23; Indianapolis 38, New York Jets 14; Washington 27, New Orleans 24; Denver 17, Kansas City 11; Buffalo 13, Seattle 3.

Bengals 42, Steelers 7

At Cincinnati, Eddie Brown set a club record with 216 yards receiving, including an 86-yard scoring play on the hosts' second play from scrimmage.

Boomer Esiason threw three touchdown passes, his first in three games. He was 15-for-23 for 318 yards as Cincinnati rolled up more than 500 yards of offense.

The Bengals scored on their first three possessions and had little trouble with the Steelers, 2-8, their worst record since 1969, when they went 1-13 in Chuck Noll's first year as head coach.

Eagles 30, Rams 24

Philadelphia's defense victimized Jim Everett for four interceptions — the Rams quarterback had yielded just five, fewest in the NFL.

Randall Cunningham threw three touchdown passes, two to rookie tight end Keith Jackson, who entered the game as the league's leading receiver with 51 catches. Cunningham, who twice left the game with a sore right ankle, completed 22 of 39 passes for 323 yards for Philadelphia, 5-5.

The Rams, 7-3, had won five straight road games.

Patriots 21, Dolphins 10

John Stephens continued his strong running with 104 yards, giving him more than 100 yards in three consecutive games. The last Patriot to do that was Don Calhoun in 1976.

Stephens had a 13-yard TD run and Bob Perryman scored from the 1. On the series leading to those touchdowns, the Patriots stayed entirely on the ground. Of the 23 total plays on those two series, Stephens, a first-round draft choice from Northwestern (La.) State, ran 15 times for 75 of the 120 yards.

The AFC East rivals, both fighting to stay in playoff contention, are 5-5 after the Patriots' sixth consecutive victory over Miami.

Giants 29, Cowboys 21

The Giants won their fourth consecutive game against the dregs of the NFL and stayed in control of the NFC East. After mediocre outings in two wins over Detroit and one against Atlanta, New York surged to 26 points in the first half against Dallas, 2-8. The Cowboys have lost six straight, the first time they have dropped that many in one season since their first year.

Basketball exhibition set

K-State's men's basketball team will have its first exhibition game of the year Nov. 9, when Athletes In Action visits Bramlage Coliseum.

AIA lost its season opener to Louisville Wednesday by a final score of 105-82. Last year, however, AIA won its first 12 games of the season including triumphs over Florida, Clemson, Houston and California.

Tickets for the AIA game, which tips off at 7:30 p.m., will be available at the Bramlage Coliseum door at a price of $4 for adults and $1 for college students and younger.

Lady Cats' tickets on sale

K-State Lady Cats' season basketball tickets are on sale at Ahearn Field House. According to athletic ticket manager Carol Adolph, student season tickets and general public season tickets are available.

Student tickets are $8.00, with a fee card, and cover all 12 Lady Cat home games. General public season tickets are $30.

The Lady Cats open the season Nov. 25 and 26 when they play host for the McCall Pattern Classic.

Purdue tickets still available

General public and student tickets are available for the K-State men's basketball season opener with Purdue on Nov. 26 at 7:30 p.m.

Athletic ticket manager Carol Adolph said that 1,259 student tickets to the Purdue game were sold by Thursday night, and that tickets for the game remain. Students can purchase up to 20 tickets but must have a fee card for each ticket purchased. Purdue student tickets cost $5 while tickets for the general public are $12. Tickets are also available for the Missouri-St. Louis game on Dec. 22 and the Texas-Arlington game on Jan. 5 at a cost of $3 for students and $10 for the public.

Jones, Waitz win marathon

NEW YORK — Steve Jones of Wales won the New York City Marathon on Sunday, redeeming himself after three years of sub-par marathons, and Grete Waitz of Norway led all the way in becoming the fastest women's finisher for a record ninth time.

Jones, 33, in his New York marathon debut, took the lead near the 12.4-mile mark, was caught briefly at 15 miles by Salvatore Bettiol of Italy, then moments later took command, completing the 26-mile 385-yard course in 2 hours, 8 minutes, 20 seconds.

It was the second fastest New York City Marathon ever run, only seven seconds behind the course record of 2:08:13 by Alberto Salazar in 1981. Salazar's time was not an American record, however, because the course was 43 yards short.

Spikers downed by Colorado

From Staff and Wire Reports

K-State's hopes for a berth in the 1988 Big Eight volleyball tournament took a turn for the worse Friday night when the Wildcats fell to the University of Colorado, 12-15, 15-4, 15-13, 15-8 in Boulder.

"As it is a lot of the times, the key to the match was the third game," K-State coach Scott Nelson said. "We were tied at 13 and lost the game."

The loss drops the 'Cats to 13-11 overall and 2-6 in the Big Eight while Colorado, in its third year of playing volleyball, improved to 17-9 and 6-3 in the Big Eight.

The top four finishers in the regular season qualify for the conference tournament later this month in Salina. Last year, K-State earned fourth place with a 5-7 league mark.

"There can be no more losses for us," Nelson said. "We can still make the tournament, but we are not in control of our own destiny."

The 'Cats struggled offensively throughout the contest, Nelson said. K-State was led by Shawnee Call's 14 kills and 15 digs. Tami Tibbetts added eight kills.

The 'Cats will be back at home on Friday and Saturday nights. Friday, K-State will play host to the University of Missouri and Saturday the nationally-ranked University of Oklahoma Sooners are in town.

K-State lost to both teams this season on the road. The 'Cats were just three points away from upsetting the conference's top team three weeks ago in Norman, Okla., before losing in five games, 13-15, 13-15, 15-10, 15-7, 15-13. The Tigers also scored a victory over the 'Cats Oct. 12 in Columbia, Mo., 15-9, 11-15, 16-14, 15-8.

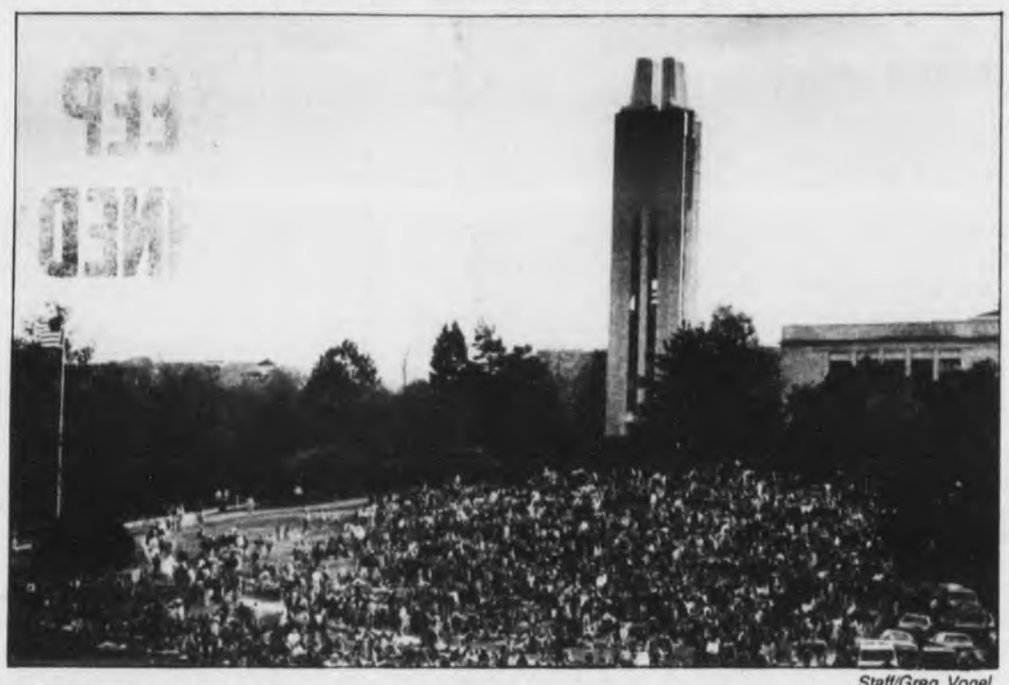
Fan says: 'We're here for the party'



Staff/Greg Vogel

Fans tear down the south-end goal posts after the University of Kansas defeated K-State, 30-12. About 34,000 fans, not including the 5,000 on the hill, braved the high winds and cold temperatures to attend the game that ended the Jayhawks' 15-game losing streak. After taking down the goal posts, the fans carried them up the hill to place them in Potter's Lake.

More than 5,000 fans gather on the hill overlooking Memorial Stadium at the University of Kansas to watch the traditional intrastate rivalry between the Jayhawks and the Wildcats.

Hill attracts 5,000 plus fans

By Janet Swanson
News Editor

It was cold. It was windy. And the goal posts came down.

They came down with the help of fans, which at one time numbered more than 5,000, who had spent the afternoon on Campanile Hill at the University of Kansas.

"This is it. I'm going to make you a prediction. If we win — see those goal posts — they're coming down. And when they come down, they're going into Potter's Lake," said Paul Friel, KU sophomore in business. "I just hope to God no one gets hurt."

The crowd jammed the hill Saturday afternoon to watch K-State and Kansas do battle in the "Toilet Bowl II." Or, at least, some of the hill-goers were there to watch the game.

"I came because I thought we had a chance of winning," said Julie Boos, freshman in radio and television. "But then I figured out that we didn't."

Curtis Harris, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, said the game convinced him of one thing.

"They're hopeless. They are. They need more backing from the school and community. And that will never happen. They're just hopeless," he said.

Sean Morris, junior in business, probably summed up the mood of most hill spectators the best.

"We're here for the party," he said.

And party most fans did.

"The game is secondary. It's just an excuse to party," said K. Andrew Wroblewski, KU junior in education. "I was shocked at the number of people out here. I've never seen the hill this packed."

Huddling under blankets and in jackets, they pulled drinks out of coolers, poured them from kegs and took shots from bottles. Some K-Staters, and even KU fans, sported shirts taking shots at KU's men's basketball team being placed on probation.

One entrepreneur spent the afternoon selling his "Thanks Larry" T-shirts for $10.

During halftime or when the game's action slowed down, empty Coors party balls were used for volleyballs as the crowd created its own excitement.

"The hill is the place to be. This is what it's all about. The party is here," said Tim Dean, senior in education.

Located at the south end of Memorial Stadium, the hill slopes from the Campanile bell tower to the field.

"If we had a hill like this, I'd sit on it," said Bruce Hardacre, junior in architecture and design.

Pat Dean, sophomore in business, said the fans on the hill are ones who didn't want to pay $15 for a ticket into the stadium.

"Who would want to (pay it)?" he asked.

The hill, said Doug Robben, senior in animal science, enables "social interaction" between students from KU and K-State.

"This (the hill) is just great. That's all that can be said. It's great," Robben said.

Staff/Jeff Stead

Dave Bangert, Lawrence, and Burt Morey, junior in civil engineering, cheer on the hill.

Nancy Manning, senior in human development, said fans on the hill can move around and aren't confined to their seats.

"It allows everybody to mingle and not have to stay in the same place the whole time," she said. "By the way, I'm proud to say, I'm not related to Danny Manning."

More than 34,000 fans were in the stadium Saturday, but Dan Leweke, 1984 graduate, said it would take a free ticket and beer to entice him.

"Even then, I don't know that I'd go," he said.

Burt Morey, junior in civil engineering, agreed.

"It's a lot better to be here than there (inside the stadium)," he said. "Here we can move around and party."

Waving a KSU flag, Morey said that although the crowd was almost equally divided, he hadn't seen many problems.

"We're all here for the same thing — to have fun," he said.

Rivalry increases popularity of shirts

By Christina Doherty
Collegian Reporter

Some people might claim that college students will use any excuse to buy a T-shirt.

Well, this weekend K-State students showed this theory to be correct. The excuse is an old one — rivalry.

To demonstrate the rivalry between K-State and the University of Kansas, K-State students wore T-shirts at the K-State — KU game game Saturday proclaiming across the back, "Let the fat lady sing across the nation, the Kansas Jayhawks on probation?!!"

The shirts, which sport a jailed Jayhawk on the front, are available at Ballards Sporting Goods store in Aggieville. About 800 have sold, said Ross Ballard, store owner.

Ballard bought the shirts from a man from Topeka who was selling them Tuesday night from the trunk of his car in Manhattan.

"(The man from Topeka) said that he has had them printed since August, and was betting that this (KU being put on probation) would happen. He had sold quite a few that night and then decided that he didn't want to mess with them anymore," Ballard said.

The shirts are a parody of shirts that were sold after KU won the NCAA championship, Ballard said.

"It is knocking the one they had last year about 'when the fat lady sings the Hawks spread their wings,'" he said.

Students who wore the shirts to the game were a bit surprised by the reactions they received.

"I didn't think I'd get as big of a reaction that I did, but I had fun with it. Most people wanted to know where they could get one, both from KU and K-State," said Carolyn McNaghten, senior in social work.

"A lot of people in Lawrence asked us to turn around so they could read them. Some people from KU thought they were funny," said Lesley Goens, junior in elementary education.

One woman traded her T-shirt for a $50 Polo rugby shirt, McNaghten said.

Sensitive detectors causing alarm

By Susan Johannsen
Collegian Reporter

Ultrasensitive smoke detectors in Nichols Hall have been the main cause for recurring false fire alarms this fall.

False alarms in Nichols started "right after the reopening of the building in the fall of 1985," said John Lambert, director of public safety. "At that time, there were 12 false alarms — eight of them were malfunctions, three of them were true and one was a prank."

In 1987, there were five false alarms and in 1988, four malfunctions were reported. The number of malfunctions is decreasing because the original problem was "an electrical problem that has since been worked out," Lambert said.

The smoke detectors are to blame. To correct the problem, the Division of Facilities Management is looking into getting better smoke detectors installed, Lambert said.

The cost of installing new detectors would vary, but could cost about $100 for each detector, said Jack Watson, assistant director for facility management and maintenance.

A study would be needed to determine how many detectors need to be replaced. It not known when new alarms will be installed, Watson said.

"Unless a study is conducted, no change will occur. The system is a top system and is designed to do what it's doing. If a change is to be made, we need to find out where the failures are first," Watson said.

The problem can also be attributed to people smoking in undesignated areas of Nichols, such as near the elevators in the atrium. The low ceiling in the atrium area also contributes to the problem, Watson said.

The Manhattan Fire Department is contracted to the University to respond to the alarms.

"The University works out a contract with the fire department at the beginning of the year. They decide on a set amount which for 1988 is $70,000 (for Nichols Hall)," said Larry Wesche, fire marshal for the Manhattan Fire Department.

The price does not change regardless of the number of alarms that occur in the building, he said.

The Veterinary Medicine Center has had similar problems in the past. However, this was due to "flies and other bugs which crawl in the system and set it off," Watson said.

Increasing voter turnout challenging

By The Associated Press

Arkansas Republicans are concerned about voters who would rather hunt deer than go to the polls. In California, officials worry that the lengthy ballot will keep people away, and Oklahomans think the negative tone of the presidential race has simply turned voters off.

With only half of eligible voters expected to turn out for Tuesday's balloting, when a president, vice president, 33 senators and 435 House members will be chosen, Republicans and Democrats alike are keenly aware that getting people to vote will be their No. 1 challenge.

Political parties, unions and other groups are running phone banks to reach swing voters as well as party faithful. As usual, workers will hand out leaflets, arrange for baby-sitters and escort people to the polls. But there are also some more unusual strategies.

In Arkansas, where the deer-hunting season opened Saturday, Republicans mounted a direct-mail campaign encouraging hunters to get an absentee ballot if they won't be back from hunting in time for the election.

Coalition '88, a group of homosexuals and others who want two California AIDS initiatives defeated, will have hundreds of volunteers on Election Day erecting "human billboards" at 70 major intersections in Los Angeles urging voters to get out and turn down the two propositions.

Both parties are conducting massive drives for the state's 13.5 million registered voters but worry about the dampening effect of a ballot with nine state initiatives and possibly hundreds of local measures. Says state GOP chairman Bob Naylor: "I'm very concerned that people will be confronted with long lines at the polls, get early results from the East Coast and absentee ballots and say, 'What the heck. I won't vote.'"

Nationwide, public-interest groups predict that only 50 percent or fewer of the eligible voters will turn out, one of the lowest percentages this century and down from the 1984 figure of 53 percent.

Reasons vary, but many pundits point to laws requiring registration several days or weeks before the election. In many other countries, registration is done automatically through the mail.

Many voters also may simply be uninterested in the presidential race and feel there is no inspiring candidate or compelling issue.

In states such as Alabama, where there is no race for governor, U.S. Senate or a major statehouse post, officials expect many voters to stay home. Oklahoma officials are equally pessimistic, blaming the tenor of the presidential race.

"There is more negative campaigning than there was four years ago, and I think it might affect the turnout," says Lance Ward, secretary of the state election board.

But parties and special-interest groups are still trying.

The AFL-CIO will have 500,000 volunteers out on Election Day, a majority of them in states with the most union members.

Volunteers sought in overseas project

By Becky Jones
Collegian Reporter

An official from Food for the Hungry, Inc. visited K-State Friday afternoon to recruit students for work overseas.

K-State was the first stop on a string of college visits for Gary Womelsduff, manager of the Hunger Corps volunteer program of Food for the Hungry. He said he came to K-State because of its strong reputation in agriculture.

Food for the Hungry was founded in 1971 in an effort to form a corporation to concentrate on food and hunger-related issues, Womelsduff said.

The Hunger Corps program is one of the Food for the Hungry sponsors. He said the different programs raise three resources for use overseas: finances, commodities — including food and seeds — and people.

Womelsduff's main job is recruiting people to be "part of the solution to hunger overseas." Food for the Hungry wants people with technical skills to serve two or three years in Latin America, Africa and Asia.

"We're working for the poorest of poor countries," Womelsduff said.

The primary work areas are in public health and nutrition, engineering — mainly water resources — and agriculture, with jobs ranging from agronomy to forestry, he said.

There are also a few jobs in computing, journalism, physical therapy, special education, accounting, auditing and administration, Womelsduff said.

Food for the Hungry is a Christian agency, he said, and is not only looking for people with the proper skills, but also for people who agree with its Christianity.

"We're looking for people who have a desire to serve both physically and spiritually," Womelsduff said.

About 50 people are working in nine countries, and about 65 positions are open. Placement is based on "how best your skill fits into what's needed in certain countries," Womelsduff said.

Hunger Corps workers are volunteers, he said, but transportation and living expenses are paid. Workers receive a monthly stipend and a stipend when they leave the country.

"It's not a paying position, but all of your expenses are met," Womelsduff said.

The program's minimum age is 21, and the program is looking for people who have finished college.

Clinic given to improve dogs' performances

By Kelly Campbell
Collegian Reporter

Stockdog enthusiasts from Kansas, Texas and Missouri attended a stockdog clinic this weekend at Weber Arena. Bill Berhow, a professional stockdog handler and trainer from Wilsal, Mont., demonstrated training methods to improve stockdog performance.

The event was sponsored by the K-State Block and Bridle Club and the Kansas Stockdog Association. Several breeds were represented, including border collies, Australian shepherds, blue heelers and briards.

The event was intended to help stockdog owners learn how to use their dogs, said Pam Wolf, member of the KSA and organizer of the event.

"So many times you see stockdogs just riding around in the back of the truck because ranchers and farmers buy these dogs, and then don't know how to use them," she said.

Berhow is one of the top stockdog trainers and handlers in the nation, Wolf said.

"His dogs have won just about every major trial in the country," she said.

Berhow demonstrated training techniques to improve stockdog performance. Twenty dogs and 18 handlers participated in the clinic.

Berhow said one common problem is a herder, such as a border collie or Australian shepherd, acting like a heeler. He said to keep a herder from losing the instinct to herd when using it primarily for driving livestock, the handler needs to spend extra time making sure the dog gathers stock. Heelers, such as the blue heeler, drive herds, but herders gather and herd stock.

"If you have a certain job to do, you do it the best way you can," he said. "The stockdog is so keen to please us that he is going to do anything to make us happy."

Wolf said: "Once you use a stockdog, you don't want to be without one."

Marcella Clark, instructor of English, said this was the first time her 9-month-old Australian shepherd has ever worked stock.

THE CLASS OF '52 COULDN'T SEE INTO THE FUTURE

Folks here are still talking about "The 1952 Incident." For some reason still unknown, a certain graduating class at a certain university missed what was certainly the opportunity of a lifetime.

The chance to meet with a recruiter from the National Security Agency.

Maybe they were busy that day. Maybe something else caught their eye. But the fact remains, a meeting with NSA could have meant a future full of challenging, exciting projects.

Now you've got the same chance. Our recruiter will be visiting campus soon in search of talented mathematicians, computer scientists, electrical engineers and linguists. We're looking for people who want to work on important hands-on assignments, right from the start.

NSA is the agency responsible for producing foreign intelligence information, safeguarding our government's communications and securing computer systems for the Department of Defense.

And we're equally committed to helping you make your future strong. So do yourself a favor and meet with us. You don't need 3-D glasses to see that it's a great opportunity.

NSA will be on campus November 29 interviewing seniors majoring in Electrical Engineering, Computer Science, Math and Language.

Asbestos handled properly no concern

By Stephanie Morrill
Collegian Reporter

Name one substance that can be found in floor tiles, brakes on cars, theater curtains, and fire-proof suits.

The answer is asbestos.

According to Collier's Encyclopedia, "asbestos is any of several varieties of fiberous materials which may be spun or felted to make fabrics, panels, or coatings that are resistant to heat and chemical action."

Many everyday items contain asbestos, but because the asbestos does not come in direct contact with people, it is not dangerous, said Richard Brenner, assistant maintenance supervisor for K-State.

"The asbestos is always well-wrapped and tightly covered to ensure that it is not dangerous," Brenner said.

Since the asbestos particles are very small, they linger in the air causing problems for individuals who inhale the substance. In some cases the individual may develop lung disease or cancer.

"We know that there are many buildings on campus that contain asbestos — for example, in the mechanical rooms of some of the buildings, but it poses no threat of danger to people," said Gene Wiley, maintenance supervisor.

"We are not perfect, nothing is, but we are aware — if any disaster ever occurred, it would be in an isolated area, such as between walls, where people wouldn't be directly involved," Brenner said.

At present, the maintenance department is not required to do a complete survey on the presence of asbestos on campus.

"But if there is a problem we'll check it very quickly," he said.

One contractor recently estimated the cost of such a survey at $40,000, Wiley said.

Several years ago, the fire marshal required the maintenance department to paint the ceiling tiles in the residence halls with a fire-retardant paint.

"The ceiling tiles themselves are made of a regular fiber," he said. "The paint, as well as the ceiling tiles, do not contain asbestos."

Asbestos can be identified as a white dust, which may be found, for example, falling off a pipe.

"If there is a problem, and we suspect it is asbestos, there may not be time to run tests. In these cases we treat the material as if it were asbestos, double-bag it, and send it to be tested," Brenner said.

The tests include removing five samples from each room, and sending them to the Certified Environmental Management Company in Salina. Technicians determine if the material is asbestos. Each sample costs $25 to test.

Heroes given Carnegie awards

By The Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — When Walter Moyseuik saw a man shoot Suzanne Mulligan outside a Toronto-area supermarket, the 67-year-old retired postman grabbed the gun from the man's hand and helped wrestle him to the ground.

"You can't turn your back on somebody who needs help," Moyseuik said by telephone from his home Friday.

Moyseuik and 15 other Americans and Canadians were pronounced heroes Sunday by the Carnegie Hero Fund Commission. Two died performing their heroic deeds.

The heroes or their survivors will receive $2,500 and a medal from the commission, which was founded by industrialist Andrew Carnegie in 1904. The commission has honored 7,274 people, including 93 this year.

Moyseuik said he was outside a shopping center in Etobicoke, Ontario, on March 12 when Mulligan, 47, was threatened by her estranged husband.

"They were about 25 feet away from me," he said. "I saw a man with a gun and he was trying to force it against her and then he fired. She kept pleading for help. I ran in and got his arm and twisted the gun out of his hand."

Moyseuik, joined by supermarket employees, held the man down until police arrived.

"It crossed my mind that I could have been shot. But I couldn't ignore her cries for help," he said.

Mulligan recovered from her gunshot wound, according to the commission.

Among the others honored by the commission are:

- Michael N. Knieriem, 46, of Thousand Oaks, Calif., who rescued a 6-year-old girl and a 4-year-old boy from their burning condominium in Newbury Park, Calif., on Oct. 2, 1987. Knieriem suffered severe smoke inhalation.
- Bobby D. Ratliff, 44, and Kenneth G. Harlow, 45, of Llano, Texas, who rescued a woman and her 12- and 4-year-old sons from their burning station wagon after a traffic accident on June 12, 1987. Harlow suffered minor burns.
- Christopher Bordeaux, 24, of Chicago, who died trying to save a 28-year-old woman who had fallen in the path of a speeding train at Lake Forest, Ill., on Jan. 11. The woman also died.
- Grant P. Clemens, 32, of Oxnard, Calif., and Kenneth R. Vandergrift, 40, of Santa Paula, Calif., who saved a 59-year-old man from his burning car after an accident in Saticoy, Calif., on Dec. 9, 1987. Both men suffered burns.
- Martin Lopez, 21, of Cuero, Texas, who saved a 10-year-old boy from a burning apartment on Aug. 5, 1987.

Oats, hair treatment among trendy items

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — If you feasted on oat bran, fed Fido with gourmet chow, pulled on a pair of preshredded jeans or leafed through a comic book this year you were one of the Americans who made those some of the hottest products of 1988, according to Adweek magazine.

The hottest products largely were "conspicuously unnecessary," the advertising and marketing trade magazine stated in this week's issue, and ran the gamut from the ephemeral novelty to technological nuisance.

Trends in trendy stuff included rapidly growing demand for oats in all forms, especially oat bran, among cholesterol-conscious Americans; Upjohn Co.'s Rogaine hair-growth treatment, which recently got federal government approval for prescription sales; a new genre of comic books aimed at adult audiences, so-called "graphic novels"; and slashed jeans, pre-damaged by the maker for that rough-and-tumble look, for $50 a pair.

The magazine said other hot stuff for 1988 included:

- Upscale pet paraphernalia, including designer dog and cat clothing, gourmet pet food and perfumed groomings;
- Trendy foods like cheese-flavored popcorn and fancy peppers;
- Black market saguaro cactuses, illegally dug up and replanted as lawn decorations in the Southwest;
- Increased use of Retin A skin wrinkle treatment by younger consumers;
- Disposable extended-wear contact lenses;
- Belt pouches, used by skiers, cyclists and, increasingly, city pedestrians;
- Technological devices such as home fax machines, electronic still cameras that can play back snapshots on the television screen and voice mail corporate telephone answering systems that direct calls and record messages.
- Computer security systems.

Adweek also said the year featured a number of retro-trends sparked by nostalgia-fueled baby boomers.

Pet Hotline provides versatile animal-assistance services

By Becky Jones
Collegian Reporter

The Pet Hotline Show, in its third season on cable channel 27, is expected to return to its regular 30-minute format this month.

The show is on at 5:45 p.m. every Monday for 15 minutes, said Beverly Hashagen, founder and director of Pet Hotline.

The show, sponsored by Pet Hotline, has a news segment, a pet kaleidoscope, a vet corner, an orphan spot, and a pet tip of the week.

Hashagen said they are planning to expand Pet Hotline and add services in the spring.

Pet Hotline is an animal-help organization with a "no-kill" policy. It provides assistance for abandoned and homeless animals.

Troy Lynn Eckart, assistant director of the organization, said the program's goals are to provide animal-assistance services and to educate the public on animal rights and animal care.

"We help the animals, and we help the public," Eckart said.

One of the programs Pet Hotline sponsors is an orphan-foster pet home program, which provides shelter for homeless animals until they are permanently adopted.

Eckart said they match volunteers and animals carefully and make regular checkups to ensure the pet and volunteer are compatible. She said they look for foster parents who will not only feed the animal but also work with it daily and provide a loving atmosphere.

"We don't allow someone to take the animal and let it just run free," she said. "We want them to be a family member. We want to make sure they get plenty of attention."

Eckart said they have about 40 animals placed in foster homes, and have had as many as 100 animals needing homes at one time.

"We're not a shelter," Hashagen said. "We're a refuge for animals who have no place to go."

People also can adopt animals permanently through Pet Hotline. They are required to complete an adoption contract, and Pet Hotline can check on the match for up to one year.

Other programs Pet Hotline sponsors include a neighborhood animal watch, which consists of volunteers looking out for animals in need; an emergency animals assistance program that provides medical help to ill, injured or abused animals and a youth group which works on animal projects to educate people about the role animals play in their lives.

Hashagen said one of the functions of Pet Hotline is to change people's attitudes and to teach the public to respect animal rights.

"I think that society today takes a very callous attitude toward living creatures," she said.

Jordan restricts imports

By The Associated Press

AMMAN, Jordan — The days of champagne and plastic roses are coming to an end in Jordan, a country running short of imported money to pay for imported goods.

The government Saturday imposed taxes and restrictions on imports aimed at saving $200 million a year in foreign currency for this country of 2.8 million people.

"We started developing a champagne budget on a beer pocketbook. ... This is why (the economy) has to be adjusted," said a senior government official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

The belt-tightening move appeared to be the first step in what the official said would be a three-to-five-year period during which Jordan hopes to slash its $6 billion to $7 billion foreign debt.

The government banned new letters of credit to finance cars and trucks, video recorders, refrigerators, microwave ovens, television sets, chandeliers, marble, plastic flowers and fruit, and a dozen other goods.

Finance Minister Hanna Odeh announced on television Sunday night that banning chandeliers alone will save $3 million.

Goods already financed were slapped with stiff import duties, sending the price of some TV sets up 40 percent. To help cushion the blow, the government cut electricity and water bills.

The blacklist targets the posh Western lifestyle many Jordanians adopted in the early 1980s, when their country was flush with money, much of it imported by hundreds of thousands of Palestinians with Jordanian passports who worked in the Persian Gulf.

"It will touch the conspicuous consumer class, which unfortunately we have developed," said Kamel Abu Jaber, a political scientist at the University of Jordan. He noted that "the large masses of people" would not be affected by the restrictions.

Some officials have said privately that the economy has been hurt by King Hussein's decision in July to renounce sovereignty over Palestinians in the Israeli-occupied West Bank, which Jordan governed from 1948 to 1967.

Plans to remove their citizenship and give them two-year instead of five-year passports led some Palestinians to withdraw savings from Jordanian banks because of the uncertainty of their status in Jordan, one official said.

One Western diplomat who requested anonymity estimated that nearly 30 percent of Jordan's currency is held by Palestinians in the West Bank and the Israeli-occupied Gaza Strip.

Vehicles require winterizing

By Julie Thompson
Collegian Reporter

Many motor homes aren't used during the winter, so many owners winterize them.

If owners take time to protect their motor homes before winter hits, spring repair expenses are often reduced, said Carolyn Fenn, manager of Four Seasons RV Center in Manhattan.

"I have seen examples of people not treating their motor homes. It is very damaging," Fenn said.

The most important preparation is draining the entire water system, said John Anderson, owner of Anderson-Superior Inc.

Freezing temperatures can cause water remaining in the system to freeze and can cause pipes to crack, Anderson said.

Some older motor homes have water lines made of copper tubing that expand and break easily, said Mike Eenhuis, service manager for Ben Pinkerton's Camper Sales in Junction City.

"The tubing made now is out of polybutylene, and it won't hurt it to freeze," Eenhuis said.

Motor home dealers agreed that water can be eliminated either by pumping air through the entire system or by adding antifreeze. If owners choose the antifreeze method, non-poisonous brands are available for motor homes, Anderson said.

Another problem with many motor homes is leakage. If a leak goes unchecked, water that builds up during the winter could require the roof and floor to be replaced. In extreme conditions, the damages may be unrepairable. Owners should inspect all seams and slants for cracks before wet weather comes, Anderson said.

"It's a good idea for them to seal the seams of their roof with caulking once a year," he said.

Another problem with storage is sun exposure, which can damage fabrics in motor homes. All curtains should be closed to protect carpeting and furniture from ultraviolet rays.

"It would be nice to park (the home) inside to protect against the sunlight, but most people can't do this," Anderson said.

The sun also damages tires during winter. Dry rot will occur when the sun breaks down the tire. Covering the tires with vinyl or tarp protects them, Fenn said.

Interior cabinetry, paneling and wood trim have a tendency to dry out during storage, so treatment with furniture polish or lemon oil is recommended, according to Gulf Stream Coach Inc.

Outside waxing should also be considered. Baking soda on a wet cloth is ideal for removing dirt and grease from the mirrors, windshield and head lights without scratching the surfaces, according to Gulf Stream.

receipts, Howard prepared the report and gave it to Chatterjee, who was at the Student Government Services office in the Union.

Chatterjee then called Cuffy to ask him to come to the office and sign the report.

Chatterjee said that after Bolden's phone call she conferred with three members of the committee present at the SGS office, as well as Student Senate Chairman Doug Folk and SGA adviser Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities.

During that discussion a decision was made to grant an exception to Cuffy, Chatterjee said.

"I told them what the situation was, we talked about it, and we came to a consensus," she said.

But two members of the committee present said no discussion took place between 5 and 6 p.m. on granting Cuffy an exception.

"We didn't consult on Laurian. Eva made the decision," said Mike Kadel, vice chairman of the committee.

Kadel said at that time a discussion was conducted on the question of granting an exception to Cormaci.

"We consulted on Mike Cormaci," Kadel said. "(Cormaci) assumed that since he had no expenditures (since the previous report), he didn't have to turn in a report."

Kadel said the campaign expenditure regulations require a candidate to file a report even if no expenses have been incurred.

Craig Corsini, committee member, agreed with Kadel's version of events.

"It was not a committee decision," Corsini said.

When asked if Chatterjee made the decision on her own without consulting the committee members, Corsini said, "As far as I can tell."

Chatterjee said a lot of activity was taking place in the SGS office between 5 and 6 p.m.

"I don't feel like I said, 'This is what we're going to do,'" she said.

Another committee member said Chatterjee did consult with those present after Bolden's phone call and the group, as a whole, made a decision.

"Yes, she did (consult with us)," Wade Whitmer said. "I think there were four of the committee members there and she asked if she should let (the report) in."

"We thought it would be the appropriate thing to do because it was not the fault of Laurian and of Ira," Whitmer said.

Cuffy's and Cormaci's cases were completely different, Whitmer said.

"(Cuffy's) resolved itself within a half hour to 45 minutes," Whitmer said. It was two hours before Cormaci contacted the SGS office.

Kadel said that during a meeting of about 10 members of the committee later that night, a discussion was conducted on granting an exception to Cuffy and removing Cormaci's name from the ballot.

Debate

I am a minority, I am concerned for all students. I want input from all students. I want a unified student body made up of all groups."

The session, attended by about 30 people, was sponsored by the Union Programming Council Issues and Ideas Committee. It was the first meeting between the two candidates after last week's elections. The candidates will meet again at noon Tuesday for a formal debate in the Union Courtyard before Wednesday's runoff election.

to code the program, preventing others from changing its messages. Virtual memory involves building variety in the computer architecture to create a safe environment for its programs.

Programmers anticipate the virus and attempt to close trap doors within the computer's structure, Wallentine said.

Other preventive measures include operational controls, he said. Students, universities and companies should purchase software from respectable sources that are trustworthy. Anyone can create a virus and slip it into programs that are shared among systems.

"The benefits of sharing materials should be approached with a skeptical eye by students and corporations. The same precautions apply to networking," Wallentine said.

Jimmy McClary, computer security officer at Los Alamos, said two main efforts were under way to guard against future attacks.

The first involves enhancing intrusion detection techniques that allow searching for unexpected or unexplained changes in the behavior of the computer system, McClary said.

The other approach is to develop anti-viral codes — vaccines — that would be self-examinating. The code itself could determine if an unauthorized change was made, he said.

The Associated Press and The Kansas City Star contributed to this article.

ject for the hospital in more than 30 years.

"In June 1987, the board of directors went on a strategic planning retreat and decided the hospital needed to expand and provide improved services to the Manhattan community," he said.

The hospital has had difficulty meeting the demands of the medical staff due to advances in technology, changes in the types of patients it serves and changes in the payment system, Nunamaker said.

"The renovation will allow for special efficiencies which we don't have right now," he said.

Dr. Clyde Jones, president of the board of directors, said he was pleased at the representation of Manhattan residents at the ceremony.

Phil Brokenicky, president of the board of trustees, thanked the medical staff for making a "tremendous turnaround" and the Riley County commissioners for the responsible planning of the renovation project.

Three Soviet space scientists visited Manhattan Monday in what may be the start of an ongoing research project by the Soviet Union, NASA and K-State.

The scientists were following up on an international research project concerning the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area. The project began at K-State during the summer of 1987.

On the basis of Monday's visit, the Soviet Union will decide if it wants to study Konza Prairie and interpretations of information obtained from satellites dealing with its weather and soil conditions.

Ed Kanemasu, agronomy professor and director of K-State's Evapotranspiration Laboratory, accompanied the Soviet scientists and three NASA officials on a Konza Prairie tour.

"This project is designed to see what information can be obtained from satellites and how to apply it to weather forecasting and agricultural systems such as the prairie," Kanemasu said.

Konza Prairie is an ideal place for the research because it is a large, uniform area of vegetation that has definite seasonal growth patterns, he said.

"We need to study a large area like this because scale models will give us different results than the real area," Kanemasu said.

In February, the Soviet Union will decide on the future of the study. If there will be future cooperative research, more Soviet and NASA scientists will come to Manhattan next summer.

The $1 to $1.5 million project will be funded by NASA, which will apply the information to other ecosystems. Its data will also be compared to data from a similar research site in Kypek, about 500 kilometers south of Moscow, he said.

If Soviet scientists conduct research here next summer, K-State researchers will reciprocate at the Kypek site during the summer of 1991.

"K-State will be internationally important concerning this type of research, and there will be a contingent of scientists interested in our findings," Kanemasu said.

The scientists also viewed the Konza Prairie and surrounding areas from an airplane.

"They needed a bird's-eye view of (Konza Prairie) and its location with respect to Tuttle and other landmarks," Kanemasu said. "It's important to know the land surrounding the area for this research.

"I think the visit went very well," he said. "(The Soviets) were interested in comparing their instruments to ours and comparing what we're doing in satellite applications to agriculture and weather.

Stephan found guilty in breach of contract suit

Stingley awarded $200,000

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A federal court jury Monday awarded $200,000 to Marcia Tomson Stingley, finding that Attorney General Robert T. Stephan breached a contract when he disclosed terms of the settlement of a sexual harassment suit she brought against him six years ago.

However, the jury rejected Stingley's arguments that publicity generated by the Oct. 29, 1985, news conference at which the terms were disclosed had shown her in a "false light." At the news conference, Stephan and a political associate, former state Sen. Bob W. Storey of Topeka, disclosed that Stingley was paid $24,000 to settle the 1982 sexual harassment suit.

Stingley, a file clerk in Stephan's office for three years until she was fired in 1982, was seeking $5.2 million in the breach-of-contract lawsuit. The jury's award was for actual damages only. It awarded no money for punitive damages.

The jury's verdict came after less than five hours of deliberations Monday afternoon.

Stephan declined comment following the verdict, but scheduled a news conference for 2 p.m. Tuesday. His press secretary, Mary Horsch, said Stephan would be at the news conference.

Stephan sat at the defense table impassively as the verdict was read just before 5 p.m. in U.S. District Court.

The attorney general bowed his head and stared downward as Judge Dale E. Saffels dismissed the jury. The assistant attorney general who helped with his defense, Carl Gallagher, comforted Stephan, patting him on the shoulder.

Asked for his reaction, Stephan said, "I don't have any comments — not right now."

Stephan left the courtroom and went to a witness waiting room, then waited until reporters had gone outside the federal building, hoping to catch him for another attempt to get comment. However, the attorney general and others in his party got into two cars in a secured parking area under the building and left without stopping for comment or to give photographers an opportunity to take his picture.

Storey also declined to comment after the verdict was read, but hugged his attorney, Deanne Hay, and smiled broadly.

Stingley sued Storey for placing her in a false light with his statements at the news conference, but the jury found Storey did nothing wrong.

Stingley declined to say much about the trial or the verdict, although when asked by reporters, she said she was not unhappy about the outcome. She also said she would move back to San Diego, where she had been living until returning for the trial.

Stingley, who filed the suit when she went by the name of Tomson, told reporters, "I'll go home and get a job and go on with my life." Asked how she felt, she said, "Just fine."

K-State employee, jury member airs feelings on Stephan's case

By Brian Hummell
Staff Writer

A member of the jury who considered the breach-of-contract suit brought against Kansas Attorney General Bob Stephan said he does not want to be in the limelight but thinks the feelings of the jury should be aired.

Mike Baysinger, K-State police officer, said the jury had unofficially agreed not to talk about the case, but he changed his mind after the jury left the courtroom and declined to talk to reporters. He said journalists' reaction to the jury members' "no comment" statements prompted him to explain the jury's actions.

"It felt like we had done something wrong," Baysinger said. "We were reticent."

Baysinger said the jury had several questions to answer the case. The first was whether or not Stephan was guilty of breaking a contract he had made with Marcia Tomson Stingley.

Stephan made the contract with Stingley after Stingley had filed a sexual harrassment suit on Dec. 24, 1982, shortly after she was fired from her job at the attorney general's office. The trial that ended Monday stemmed from an Oct. 29, 1985 press conference at which terms of the contract were disclosed.

"It only took about five to 10 minutes for us to reach a unanimous decision that he had broken the contract," Baysinger said.

"(Stephan's) lawyer was saying (Stephan) didn't have a clause with (Stingley), only with the lawyer (Vern Miller). ... It's hard to believe that would occur," Baysinger said. "It would be a pretty stupid thing for (Stephan) to do, and I don't think he's stupid."

"We believe he knew of the settlement in the beginning ... too many people in his camp knew for him not to know," Baysinger said.

He said documents from May and June 1985 produced by a political consultant hired by Stephan mentioned ways of handling the case and settlement if Stephan would have run for governor in 1986.

Baysinger said the next question the jury had to answer was whether or not Stephan was guilty of putting Stingley in a false light. He said some of the jury members at first thought Stephan had put Stingley in a false light, but, after re-examining the evidence and the definition of false light, the jury unanimously agreed that Stephan was not guilty.

The third question the jury had to answer was what damages to award Stingley for the breach of contract.

"We didn't think she was hurt by what was said in the press statement, but she has basically gone through six years of hell," Baysinger said. "She has suffered."

Art department head announces resignation

By Kevin Kramer
Collegian Reporter

Citing that significant changes are underway at K-State, Charles Stroh, head of the Department of Art, has announced his resignation, effective the end of the fall semester.

"It is an appropriate time to let someone else lead the department," he said. "Nine years is a long time to head a department with meager resources.

"I've pulled out as many rabbits out of the hat as possible," Stroh said. "And there are no more rabbits. It's time to see if there are any other magicians in the department."

Stroh said he was reluctant to leave the position while the department has a number of projects unfinished — completion of a computer imagery lab, the development of a master of fine arts degree program, the expansion of graphic design facilities, the development of a small art gallery in the Art Building called Gallery Six and the student recruitment program in the Shawnee Mission, Topeka, and Salina high schools.

"There are a number of internal issues presently underway in the use

Minority student's problems addressed

By Susan E. Faler
Collegian Reporter

K-State's administrative task force on minority students revealed a plan of action Monday morning to address the issue of minority student retention and graduation rate.

"Although serious attention is being paid to improving the social climate for minorities in the KSU community, at present, only nine percent of full-time minority students graduate from K-State within four and a half years," said Mike Lynch, assistant vice president for institutional advancement. "The comparative figure for full-time majority students is about 29 percent."

The graduation rate for minority students is unacceptably low, he said. As an institution, he said, K-State is committed to improving minority success.

The task force will gather data from 100 interviews with minority students and information from questionnaires mailed to 250 minority students.

The main focus of the questionnaires and interviews will be the institutional climate — how the minority student perceives K-State — said Hakim Salahu-Din, assistant director of undergraduate admissions. "We're pretty much going to let them set their own agenda as to what's important."

The interviews should determine minority students' perceptions of the campus, Salahu-Din said. This data and relevant new data regarding the minority student picture at K-State will be reviewed by the task force.

Student representatives from various ethnic groups on campus will conduct the interviews, said Salahu-Din.

"They will conduct the interviews from a structured interview schedule to simulate some storytelling, anecdotes, examples and detailed perceptions of what students of color at Kansas State University perceive as strengths and weaknesses," he said.

The minority retention problem is not limited to K-State. The task force will review studies from other universities on minority student retention.

The budget recommendations following the task force's findings for the coming fiscal year are due in July. If the recommendations are submitted by February, hopefully the changes can be implemented by summer, said Susan Scott, associate dean of student life.

"For cultural diversity to be valued, the majority students, as well as the minority students, need to have contact with people who are different than they.

Sakharov warns of backlash

BOSTON — Nobel laureate Andrei Sakharov, on his first trip to the West, warned Monday that Mikhail Gorbachev's political restructuring of the Soviet Union faces a domestic backlash that could endanger world peace.

The 67-year-old physicist and father of the Soviet dissident movement said political prisoners continue to languish in labor camps while new laws have increased police powers and restricted public demonstrations.

"It seems to me that this is extremely dangerous and could destroy the process of perestroika (political and economic restructuring) and turn it around," Sakharov said.

If Gorbachev's reforms do not succeed, he warned, "Internal failure could be accompanied by external expansion. For the preservation of the system, expansion would be a necessity. ... It would be a catastrophe from which would arise a great threat to all humanity."

Sakharov spoke through a translator at a two-hour news conference promoting the International Foundation for the Survival and Development of Humanity, of which he is a board member.

The foundation, formed in January by Soviet and American scientists and educators, is trying to raise approximately $10 million worldwide to support research on global problems, including arms control, hunger, disease, energy conservation and pollution.

600 die in China earthquake

BEIJING — A powerful earthquake struck just inside China's mountainous southern border, and two official radio stations reported Monday that 600 people were killed.

Radio Beijing and the Peoples' Central Broadcasting Station quoted the same reporter, Hu Jiaqi, about the death toll. Radio Beijing also quoted him as saying most of the dead were in Shanmato, a village in Yunnan province that was nearly wiped out by the earthquake, which registered 7.6 on the Richter scale.

Hu's account could not be confirmed independently. An earlier Radio Beijing report said total casualties were 600, including dead and injured.

The State Seismology Bureau in Beijing, which had reported 18 killed and 54 injured, said it had no new figures. Dispatches from the official news agency Xinhua said at least 37 people were dead and more than 100 injured.

No telephone service was available to the affected part of Yunnan province near the Burmese border. It is sparsely inhabited by farmers, many from the Lahu and Va minorities with their own languages and live in houses of wood and mud.

A Yunnan official reached by telephone said the provincial government had no idea how many people were killed. Asked whether 600 was a plausible, he said: "It might be. It might not be."

If the death toll of 600 is accurate, this would be China's worst earthquake since the 1978, when 242,000 people were killed in the northeastern city of Tangshan.

That quake measured 7.8 on the Richter scale, a gauge of the energy released by an earthquake. Each number on the scale indicates a tenfold increase in strength and a temblor of 7 can cause heavy damage in populated areas.

NYC distributing needles

NEW YORK — New York City on Monday began a pilot program to stem the spread of AIDS by providing drug addicts new hypodermic needles in exchange for their used ones.

Although the program, aimed at reducing needle sharing among addicts, is intended to serve as many as 200 intravenous drug abusers, by early afternoon no applicant had appeared at Health Department headquarters in lower Manhattan.

"Today, we're going to have only a handful," said the health commissioner, Dr. Stephen Joseph. "We're going to build slowly up" over a period of weeks or months, he predicted.

Under the $240,000 program, which has drawn heated opposition from conservatives and some minority group organizations, addicts also will receive counseling on AIDS and drugs. Another 200 addicts will receive only counseling; over time, their rate of infection will be compared with the infection rate of those receiving needles.

The program is open only to addicts over age 18 who have applied for drug treatment and been denied immediate admission to the city's overcrowded programs.

Anyone wishing to apply Monday had to locate a small room down a first-floor corridor marked "Employees Only." No sign announced the location of the room, and applicants had to ask for directions and pass several police officers to reach the program's office.

Applicants would be asked to fill out a consent form, learn about the program and take a blood test. They would receive a kit including a condom, sterile water and pamphlets about safe sex and needle hygiene.

Drug bust yields $70 million

SPRINGFIELD, Mo. — A routine traffic stop this weekend turned into a $70 million, 1,100-pound cocaine bust, the Missouri State Highway Patrol said Monday.

The seizure joins a list of Interstate 44 drug busts in southwest Missouri, and is one of the largest in recent years in the United States.

Patrol spokesman Sam Kaunley said New Mexico authorities seized about 1,180 pounds of cocaine in July, 1986. In 1986 in Miami, officials found more than 6,000 pounds of cocaine on a Venezuelan freighter. More than 3,000 pounds were seized at the Miami airport in 1982.

The patrol said Trooper Jack McMullin found the cocaine packaged in one kilogram bags in cardboard boxes in the rear of a car he stopped for speeding on Interstate 44 on the east edge of Springfield Sunday morning.

Kaunley said the cache had a wholesale value of $70 million, but could not estimate its street value.

"The retail value is an astronomical figure," he said.

James D. McCarnes and William G. Childress, two Los Angeles men who were in the car, were arraigned Monday on charges of transportation and possession of cocaine, according to the Greene County court clerk.

Kaunley said the men consented to a search of the car.

A number of drug seizures have taken place after searches of cars stopped along Interstate 44, which officials say is a major corridor for illegal drug couriers. In a February incident that at the time was considered the largest cocaine seizure in state history, troopers found 223 pounds of the drug.

Corrections

Due to a reporter's error in Monday's story about an exception granted by the SGA election committee, it was incorrectly reported that Mike Cormaci did not contact the SGS office until two hours after Cormaci's campaign staff was contacted by the elections committee.

Members of his committee were contacted by SGS officals before 5 p.m. and were told that Cormaci had to personally turn in the report. About 5:15 p.m., Cormaci notified the SGS office he was on his way to turn in the report. He was told to wait until the committee notified him with its decision as to whether it would accept the report late.

The committee notified Cormaci of its decision not to accept the report and not to place his name on the ballot at about 6:15 p.m.

Due to incorrect information given to the reporter, Pam Wolf was listed as the organizer of the stockdog clinic in Monday's Collegian. Scott Anderson, senior in animal science and industry, was the event's organizer, along with the Stockdog Clinic Committee of K-State Block and Bridle Club.

National, state issues to be decided by Kansas' voters

Optical mark readers to tally the vote when Riley County takes to the polls

By Erwin Seba
Senior Staff Writer

Kansans, like many Americans, will step into voting booths today and select a president, congresssional representatives and state representatives and also will decide state questions.

In Riley County, ballots will be counted by optical mark readers like those used for computer card tests in large classes.

Voters must darken the oval next the candidate's name. Making other marks in other ovals may make the ballot unreadable.

If the scanner cannot read a ballot, it will be hand-counted unless it is a "marked ballot," said Ilene Colbert, deputy county clerk.

Marked ballots are ones on which voters have written their names or comments about a candidate, said Colbert. Marked ballots are counted at the discretion of election officials.

After filling in the oval on the ballot, which is contained in a metal sleeve similar to a clipboard, the voter takes the ballot and sleeve to a canvasser supervising the voting area.

The canvasser will remove a numbered stub from the bottom of the ballot and then place the sleeve on top of the ballot box, so the ballot can slide out of the open end of the sleeve into the ballot box.

The stubs are collected in an envelope, Colbert said.

Kansans to vote on amendment

By Erwin Seba
Senior Staff Writer

Along with selecting a president, Kansans will be voting on an amendment to the state constitution.

The amendment would authorize the Kansas Legislature, if it so decided, to reapportion the state representative and senate districts during the 1989 legislative session based on the recent state census.

In reapportioning the districts, according to the language of the amendment, the Legislature would not count military personnel who were not residents of the state and non-resident college students.

College students who are residents of the state would be counted in the district of their residence and not in the district where they attend college.

The amendment also authorizes the Legislature to carry out a reapportionment of state legislative districts based on the 1990 federal census. That reapportionment would be carried out during the 1992 legislative session.

The 1992 reapportionment would follow the same guidelines for college students and military personnel as the 1989 reapportionment.

All reapportionments after 1992 would be based on the federal census and would follow the guidelines for exclusion of non-resident military personnel and college students. It would also count resident military personnel and college students in the districts of their residence.

The amendment provides an automatic process through which the state Supreme Court would evaluate the validity of the reapportionment.

Oukrop receives professor's award

By The Collegian Staff

Carol Oukrop, head of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications, received this year's Cruise Palmer Distiguished Professor Award.

The annual award was established for outstanding professors by Cruise Palmer in 1977. The award includes a $5,000 annual salary supplement for its recipient.

Oukrop was recommended for the award by Thomas Isenhour, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences. His recommendation was given to the Council of Deans. The council selected Oukrop because of her outstanding leadership qualities and to recognize her achievements in the school, Isenhour said.

Oukrop said her personal goal for the school is regaining the accreditation lost in May 1987. This includes promoting funding for the school in order to increase its faculty and update equipment.

Under Oukrop's leadership, the department was promoted to a school, acquired the A.Q. Miller name and a received a $1 million donation.

Oukrop received her bachelor's degree from the University of North Dakota. She received her master's degree and her doctorate in mass communications from the University of Iowa.

"I am encouraged by the opportunity for professional enrichment," she said.

Museums depict area's heritage

By Christina Doherty
Collegian Reporter

For those wanting to learn about the area's history, any one of the four Manhattan museums is a place to start.

The Riley County Historical Museum emphasizes Kansas and Western American history as it relates to Riley County history, said Cheryl Collins, director of the museum.

It was founded in 1915 by the Riley County Historical Society and is in the Pioneer Log Cabin in the City Park.

The museum is a county museum, receiving most of its funding from the county and the Riley County Historical Society.

The museum has about 20,000 items, Collins said, ranging from arrowheads found in the area to furniture of various eras.

The library contains about 4,000 books, 2,000 periodicals, 98 feet of manuscripts, 123 feet of archival material and 6,000 photographs, she said. Most of the items were donated.

Collins said the Hartford House, which is being repaired, is one of the most interesting items in the museum. It is one of the 10 to 14 prefabricated houses that came on the Hartford Steamboat to Manhattan in 1855.

"To my knowledge, it has to be the earliest house in the county. It is very unique, being one of the prefabricated houses," Collins said. Prefabricated houses are constructed in standard sections so they can be easily shipped and handled.

The Goodnow House Museum is next to the Riley County Historical Museum on Claflin Road and is sponsored by the Kansas State Historical Society.

The original house was built in 1861, with an addition made in 1868. It became state property in 1969.

Isaac Tichenor Goodnow, who was one of the first K-State supporters, was the original owner of the house, said Kathleen Brown, curator of the Goodnow House.

Most of the pieces found in the house belonged to the Goodnows. The museum houses items like clothing of the era, Goodnow's rock collection and furniture.

"One of the most interesting pieces is the microscope that belonged to Mrs. Goodnow," Brown said. "In 1857, (Mr. Goodnow) brought it to her from the (East Coast)."

The museum also has the microscope's case and some of its original slides.

The Riley County Historical Society owns three museums in the Manhattan area, and, last December, it acquired the Rocky Ford School, a one-room county school that was built in 1903, said Jeanne Mithen, librarian for the Riley County Historical Museum.

Mithen said the Riley County Historical Society is considering two plans for the house. It will either remodel it to look as it did in 1903 or fashion it into a museum of one-room schoolhouses.

"(The society) wants to have it so a class can go out there for a day to have class," Mithen said.

The opening date is not known, she said.

The Wolf-Butterfield House, 630 Fremont St., is presumed to have been built around 1865 and was originally used as a tavern and inn. The inn was a common stop for the Butterfield Overland Dispatch stagecoach and freight line, said Maxine Nelson, staff member of the Wolf-Butterfield House.

After changing hands a few times, the building was sold to the Max Wolf family in 1941.

K-State football player arrested

By The Collegian Staff

The Riley County Police Department arrested a starter on K-State's football team for battery early Monday morning.

Chad Faulkner, junior in physical education, was arrested at about midnight at 1870 College Heights. He was released shortly after the arrest on $1,000 bond, according to police records.

The warrant for his arrest stemmed from an event that took place about six months ago. Faulkner broke up a fight, he said, when he was working as a doorman at Auntie Mae's Parlor, an Aggieville bar. One of the people involved in the fight is now charging that Faulkner criminally battered him when he broke up the fight, he said.

Faulkner, who quit working at the bar this summer, said he does not know the name of the person who is pressing charges nor why the plaintiff waited until now to pursue a criminal suit.

"I forgot all about (the incident). I did not think a thing about it — until now," Faulkner said.

America gets what it demands from candidates

I'm glad this election is almost over. Yes, I'm sick of all the lying, finger-pointing, nasty insinuation, issue-dodging and flag-waving. But do you know what makes me really sick?

The people who keep complaining about it. If I see one more man-on-the-street interview with another self-righteous citizen complaining about the campaigns, I'm going to lose my lunch.

Time and time again, I hear the same old average Joe griping about the candidates not talking about "how they're gonna help me" or "the important issues." A Newsweek poll indicates that nearly two of every three Americans think better candidates could have been found, which leads me to wonder who it was that selected these candidates in the first place, and why they now think they have the right to moan about it.

After all, this country is still a democracy. The candidates we select and the campaign rhetoric we believe reflect who we are. The success of negative tactics in this year's campaign is a mirror image of a negative electorate motivated solely by fear and contempt. People simply don't know what they want.

Whenever I hear someone complain about the candidates, I want to ask them, "What exactly do you want them to do as president?" And then I'd want to hear something more specific than "address my needs" or "be a leader."

The only thing that most voters seem to know is what they don't want. They don't want a wimp or a criminal-coddler. They don't want their taxes raised. They don't want the communist hordes at their doorstep. A negative campaign suits them perfectly. It tells voters what is rotten with each candidate, and how it could lead to all sorts of awful malaise, despair and other stuff.

But what really makes me sick is the people (40 percent of Americans, according to Newsweek) who have the sheer audacity to blame the press for all the negativity. It's as if these people suddenly discovered that most of what the news media cover is bad news. Remember way back, before the campaigns started, when we were bombarded with stories about AIDS, airline crashes, inner-city gangs, drugs, child molestation and government graft? Were people complaining back then or were they all ears as Geraldo investigated prostitution and satanism?

MARK SCHMELLER
Collegian Columnist

All the awful stuff about our nation sold like hotcakes back then, so why shouldn't awful things about our candidates sell just as well? The sad fact is that the people who complain loudest about the negative campaigns are the ones who go straight home, flip on the television, and hoot and holler as George and Mike mix it up real good. Then they stay tuned for Morton Downey Jr. Do we really expect the same country that is thrilled by the pornographic excess of tabloid journalism to be any more noble when it comes to selecting a leader?

Moreover, what's so bad about negative campaigns? It's nothing worse than what we usually see. If Bush calling Dukakis a commie was the worst thing that happened last week, then the world is in pretty damn good shape.

In addition, the negativity of this year's campaign says a lot about what our society is really all about. For one, racism is still a powerful force. Consider the Bush campaign's use of Willie Horton, the man who raped a woman and murdered her boyfriend while on parole in Massachusetts. Horton has not become a centerpiece of the Bush campaign because penal reform is a central campaign issue.

Indeed, the job of president has little to do with prisons. Nor is the Horton incident unique — both Bush and President Reagan have supported similar prison furlough programs which have resulted in similar incidents. Horton has become central to the Bush campaign because he is black and the woman he raped is white. The Bush campaign staffers, who understand the power of symbolism better than anyone in the business, knew the powerful effect that the image of a black man raping a white woman would have on white, middle-class suburban voters.

This doesn't make Bush or his campaign staffers racists, but it does show that they understand the fears of voters. They also know that the Democratic Party, the party of black voters, only has won the majority of the white vote in one presidential election since Franklin Delano Roosevelt. The association of the Democrats with blacks has played upon the fears of many white voters for years, and it looks sure to continue. Even the Democrats, who all but hid Jesse Jackson after their convention, understand this.

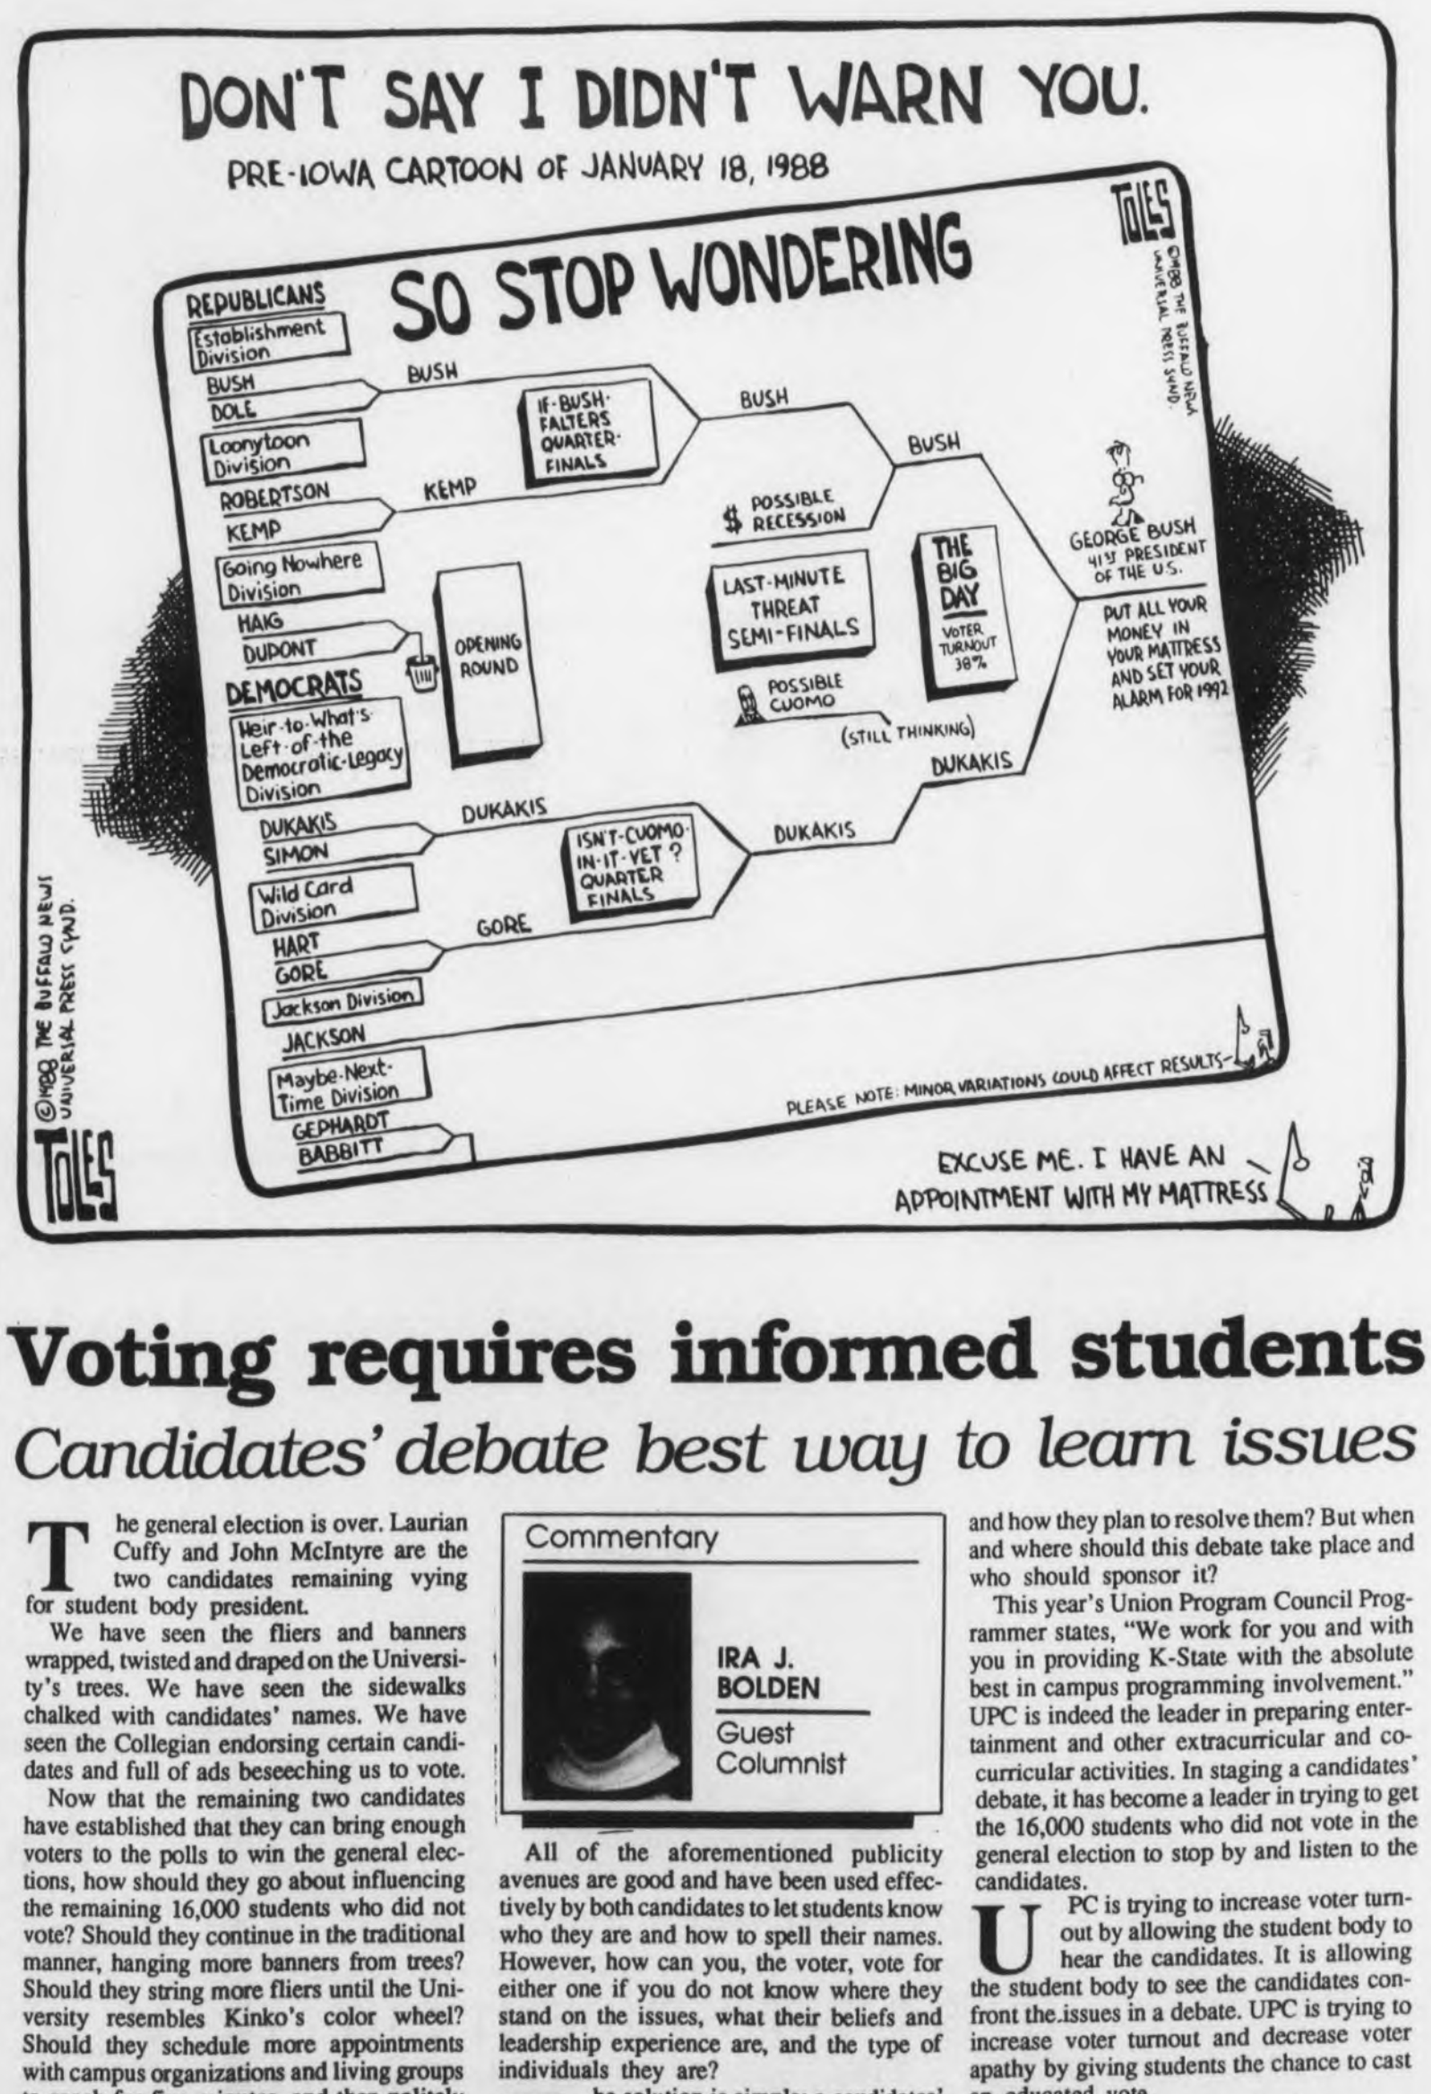
All negative campaigning follows the same model, and it really must, when dealing with an electorate more motivated by fear, contempt and vicarious pornographic fascination than by independent thought.

It reminds me of something that presidential candidate Adlai Stevenson said after a speech in Boston, where a woman in the crowd shouted, "Mr. Stevenson, you have won the vote of every thinking American!"

"Yes," Stevenson replied, "but I need a majority."

Elections committee ignores procedures

Once again, Student Senate forgot to look at its rule book. This time, however, the violation of rules by one of Senate's committees affects more than just a few senators who face potential impeachment. It affected potential student body presidential campaigns and the legitimacy of students to govern most of their own affairs.



Presidential candidates are required to turn in a campaign expenditure report before a specified time or the candidate's name is removed from the ballot. Candidates Mike Cormaci and Laurian Cuffy did not meet the deadline.

After some deliberation, the election committee agreed that Cuffy's name would remain on the ballot, but Cormaci did not provide acceptable grounds for being granted an exception. But the committee was just rubber-stamping a decision that had already been made by one member of the committee, and the candidates already had been notified of that decision.

Senate's rule book requires that violations be heard by the elections committee. But someone was apparently better than the rule book and made the decision alone.

Powers were overstepped and the legitimacy of the election was called into question. Senate, if it chooses, could properly oversee this committee by overruling its decision. But that hasn't, and probably won't, happen.

The Senate would serve the University's interest better if it would throw away the rules instead of allowing committees to follow their own rules haphazardly. At least then the student body would not expect anything from the Senate, especially goverance by the laws Senate members set for their committees.

Voting requires informed students

Candidates' debate best way to learn issues

The general election is over. Laurian Cuffy and John McIntyre are the two candidates remaining vying for student body president.

We have seen the fliers and banners wrapped, twisted and draped on the University's trees. We have seen the sidewalks chalked with candidates' names. We have seen the Collegian endorsing certain candidates and full of ads beseeching us to vote.

Now that the remaining two candidates have established that they can bring enough voters to the polls to win the general elections, how should they go about influencing the remaining 16,000 students who did not vote? Should they continue in the traditional manner, hanging more banners from trees? Should they string more fliers until the University resembles Kinko's color wheel? Should they schedule more appointments with campus organizations and living groups to speak for five minutes, and then politely excuse themselves to go to the next meeting after barely entertaining questions? Should they also use the ever-popular advertising technique of having supporters wear the fall campaign wardrobe of sweatshirts, T-shirts and buttons — all displaying the candidate's name?

Commentary

IRA J. BOLDEN
Guest Columnist

All of the aforementioned publicity avenues are good and have been used effectively by both candidates to let students know who they are and how to spell their names. However, how can you, the voter, vote for either one if you do not know where they stand on the issues, what their beliefs and leadership experience are, and the type of individuals they are?

The solution is simple: a candidates' debate. A debate is a regulated discussion of a given proposition between opposing sides. Everyone enjoys a good argument, and what better argument for students to witness than one between the two individuals vying for student body president, especially if the individuals discuss the issues and how they plan to resolve them? But when and where should this debate take place and who should sponsor it?

This year's Union Program Council Programmer states, "We work for you and with you in providing K-State with the absolute best in campus programming involvement." UPC is indeed the leader in preparing entertainment and other extracurricular and co-curricular activities. In staging a candidates' debate, it has become a leader in trying to get the 16,000 students who did not vote in the general election to stop by and listen to the candidates.

UPC is trying to increase voter turnout by allowing the student body to hear the candidates. It is allowing the student body to see the candidates confront the issues in a debate. UPC is trying to increase voter turnout and decrease voter apathy by giving students the chance to cast an educated vote.

The stage has been set — the Union Courtyard, Wednesday at noon. Now it is up to the students to use the opportunity UPC has given them.

Collegian Editorial Policies

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR are always encouraged. Those which pertain to matters of campus and/or public interest are especially encouraged, and are given the highest priority.

Letters should be kept as brief as possible, preferably under 300 words. Those who cannot condense their opinions should consider submiting their letter in the form of a guest column. All letters are subject to editing for space and style.

GUEST COLUMNS are also encouraged. The column should be no longer than two double-spaced, typed pages. If the submission is used as a column and not a letter to the editor, it will be accompanied by the author's photograph.

UNSIGNED EDITORIALS represent the consensus opinion of the Collegian's editorial board. Opinion columns do not necessarily reflect the opinions of the Collegian management, Student Publications, Inc. or the newspaper staff in general.

Miller narrows list of coaches to 5

Coach might be named by Nov. 21

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

Athletic Director Steve Miller said Monday that the list of perspective football coaches to replace Stan Parrish has been narrowed to five. He expects that number to be down to two or three by Friday, though he will not announce the names until early next week.

Miller said that the search committee will meet on Friday to decide on the final candidates for the position.

"We feel very good about the quality and quantity of the people that have responded to the opening," Miller said. "And we feel we have a chance of officially naming a coach by the 21st of November.

"The way the coach coaches at K-State must be different than the way he coached some place else."
— Steve Miller athletic director

"However, there is a chance that we won't, but we do want the new coach in his office by the first week in December. This search will not go on ad infinitum."

Miller said that he has interviewed 14 people in person and has "talked to scores of interested parties over the phone and through letters.

"I went and saw the people that I felt had the highest qualities and could make a difference to this program," Miller continued. "I found out very quickly that it is important to see these people in person, so you can get a feel for what they represent. There is a certain character in a person that I am looking for and you can't see that in applications. They're just too impersonal."

Miller denied recent reports that the new coach would be paid higher than the national average.

"I think the coach now (Stan Parrish) gets about $72,000 and we will definitely up that, but not to $95,000 or $100,000. I don't know where they got that stuff," he said. "You are always going to have a pay raise when there is a new hiring, but what that will be, I don't know. There will be a negotiation process to go through."

Miller also said that the new coach will be able to hire his own staff, although the athletic department is asking that the new coach considers interviewing the current staff.

"The way the coach coaches at K-State must be different than the way he coached some place else," Miller said. "And that makes the football coach's job at K-State a whole lot trickier than at other schools — for numerous and obvious reasons. But we feel pretty good right now."

A few names have surfaced as possible favorites for the job, although nothing has been confirmed. The possibilities are: Larry Coker, defensive coordinator at Oklahoma State, Ron Dickerson, Penn State secondary coach, Frank Falks, assistant coach at Arizona in charge of running backs and Jerry Pettibone, Northern Illinois coach.

Staff/Joe Freeman

Steve Miller, K-State athletic director, is expected to narrow the list of prospective head football coaches to two or three by Friday and could hire a new coach by Nov. 21. The annual salary of the new coach is expected to be between $72,000 and $95,000.

Sports Briefly

'Cats' Smith out for year

Several players missed Kansas State's football practice Monday after being banged up in the 30-12 loss Saturday to Kansas.

Missing were defensive tackle Alan Smith, who will be lost for the season with a knee injury; defensive tackle Doug Blackbourne and defensive back Dimitrie Scott, who both have shoulder separations; and nose guard Mark Young with an ankle injury.

Smith, Young and Scott are expected to miss Saturday's game against Iowa State.

Kansas State's total of 76 scholarship players has dropped into the 60s because of the injuries.

KU's Boykin gets honor

LAWRENCE — Deral Boykin, one of several true freshmen who have been trying to hold Kansas' beleaguered defense together, was named Big Eight defensive player of the week.

The native of Kent, Ohio, had seven solo tackles and two assists from his safety position Saturday against Kansas State. He also intercepted a pass to stop one Kansas State drive and broke up another pass on a key third down play. Boykin is the first Jayhawk to be named defensive player-of-the-week since Willie Pless in 1985.

Lasorda best in both leagues

NEW YORK — Tommy Lasorda, already named manager of the year in the National League by the Baseball Writers' Association of America, now has received the same honor for both leagues from The Associated Press.

Lasorda was the overwhelming choice as the AP Major League Manager of the Year for 1988 in voting announced Monday.

The Los Angeles manager, who led his team to the World Series championship, received 97½ points in voting by a nationwide panel of sports writers and broadcasters.

Astros name Howe skipper

HOUSTON — Art Howe, a Texas Rangers' coach for the past four seasons, returned on Monday to the team he once played for as he was named manager of the Houston Astros.

Howe replaced Hal Lanier, who was fired Oct. 2 after the final game of the season.

"(Team owner) John McMullen and I feel Art Howe combined the type of approach, background and communications skills necessary to manage in today's difficult baseball climate," said Astros general manager Bill Wood.

Howe, a Houston resident in the off-season, beat out Astros coach Matt Galante to become the club's 10th manager. Former New York Yankees general manager Lou Piniella also was a candidate for the job.

Mariners hire A's Lefebvre

SEATTLE — The Seattle Mariners on Monday named Jim Lefebvre, hitting instructor and third base coach for the Oakland Athletics, as their new manager.

"Jim was our No. 1 choice to manage the Mariners because he's a winner," said Woody Woodward, the Mariners' vice president for baseball operations. "Jim's background as a major league player, as an instructor, as an AAA manager and as a major league coach shows success in all his endeavors."

Lefebvre, 46, said the Mariners, last in the American League West this season, "have a chance to do some exciting things. It's going to take a little time, but I'm ready."

TKE football team makes nationals

By Nancy Prosser
Collegian Reporter

The Tau Kappa Epsilon flag football team will be taking advantage of a chance to play in a national flag football tournament in New Orleans during Christmas break. The TKEs earned the invitation by capturing the K-State All-University title in October.

Teams from across the nation are invited to participate in the tournament, which is played on the campus of the University of New Orleans. The tournament runs from Dec. 28 through Jan. 2, with 130 teams expected to participate, said Kelly Johnson, senior in marketing and team member.

"The teams are divided into four groups, each playing a round-robin tournament. The winner of the four groups then plays in the semifinals, with the winners going on to the finals," he said. The teams that make the finals play an exhibition game at halftime of the Sugar Bowl.

The TKEs are allowed 15 players on their roster, but also plan to take an extra five or six fraternity members. The trip is paid for by the participants and the TKEs estimate the cost to be about $250 per person.

"We've raised $200 so far, but figure that most of the trip will be paid for by individuals," said Greg Morgan, senior in secondary education and team member. "The flag football game that is played in the New Orleans' tournament is different than the game we play at K-State.

"It's still 7 on 7, but it's played with normal football rules. They allow only one forward pass from behind the line of scrimmage," he said. "It will be a rougher game, not necessarily more contact, but there will be more blocking. There will be good teams in New Orleans that play together year-round. We want to win, but realize that we're not quite as experienced as other teams. We might try to have some fun along the way."

Watson to miss season

By The Collegian Staff

Redshirt freshman quarterback Paul Watson will have surgery Wednesday morning on his right, throwing shoulder. Watson pulled ligaments in the shoulder during preseason workouts and then reinjured the shoulder against Missouri Oct. 7.

Rehabilitation for the Kansas City, Mo., native will take six months, which means Watson will miss the rest of the season and also spring drills.

Watson played in one full game this season, rolling up impressive numbers against Louisiana Tech in a losing effort. He set a K-State record for touchdown passes in a game and also turned in the fifth-best passing performance ever by a Wildcat quarterback.

Leonard wins in 9

By The Associated Press

LAS VEGAS — Sugar Ray Leonard got up from a fourth-round knockdown to knock out Donny Lalonde in the ninth round and write boxing history Monday night, becoming the first fighter to win titles in five weight classes.

The sensational victory gave Leonard the World Boxing Council light heavyweight title held by Lalonde and also the vacant WBC super middleweight title.

After Lalonde went down for the second time in the ninth round, referee Richard Steele didn't even bother to count, but rushed to Lalonde's aid as Leonard threw his arms high in triumph.

Lalonde seemed to have Leonard in trouble earlier in the ninth when a flurry of punches backed Leonard up. But Leonard fought back and suddenly nailed Lalonde with a right hand and followed with a flurry of punches that put the defending champion down.

Lalonde struggled up at two and took a mandatory 8-count. Then Leonard resumed the attack and smashed the Canadian to the floor, where he remained for several seconds. He would not have beaten a 10-count. The time was 2:30 of the ninth.

Leonard, 32, went down at 1:27 of the fourth round from a left-right to the head, with the right being the big punch. Leonard got up at two and took a mandatory 8-count. Lalonde landed several more head shots but Leonard escaped further damage.

Leonard moved to the attack in the fifth round, when he scored with several left jabs and a couple hard rights to the head. In the sixth round, Leonard continued his assault, with punching left jabs and several three-punch combinations to the head. The 28-year-old Lalonde scored with several punches late in the round.

Colorado makes national top 20

By The Associated Press

Colorado's football team is back in the Top Twenty for the first time in 10 years. But the stay could be a short one.

The Buffaloes, ranked 19th in this week's Associated Press poll, visit No. 7 Nebraska Saturday. Colorado, coming off a 45-8 victory over Missouri, has lost 19 of its last 20 games against the Cornhuskers.

"The game we have this weekend will determine if we can stay in," said Colorado Coach Bill McCartney, whose team is 7-2.

Washington State, 6-3 following a 24-21 win over Stanford, returned to the Top Twenty after a seven-year absence.

"For us to be ranked No. 20 is good recognition for the job we've done," Washington State Coach Dennis Erickson said. "It's a very good thing for our program."

While Colorado and Washington State moved into the Second Ten, there were no changes in the Top Ten.

Notre Dame remained No. 1 with a 54-11 victory over winless Rice, receiving 42 of 59 first-place votes and 1,160 of a possible 1,180 points from a nationwide panel of sports writers and sportscasters.

Second-ranked Southern California, which trounced California 35-3, gained some ground on the Irish. The Trojans, who host Notre Dame on Nov. 26, received 15 first-place votes and 1,122 points.

Last week, with 58 members of the 60-man panel participating, Notre Dame led 44-11 in first-place ballots and 1,144-1,097 in points.

Third-ranked Miami and No. 4 West Virginia each received one first-place vote. The Hurricanes, who beat Tulsa 34-3, had 1,065 points while the Mountaineers, who routed Cincinnati 51-13, had 979.

Rounding out the Top Ten are Florida State, UCLA, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Auburn and Wyoming.

Florida State, which blasted South Carolina 59-0, received 933 points.

UCLA, a 16-6 winner over Oregon, received 864 points; Nebraska, which defeated Iowa State 51-16, had 840; Oklahoma, which edged Oklahoma State 31-28, received 752; Auburn, which downed Southern Mississippi 38-8, had 719; and Wyoming, which crushed Texas-El Paso 51-6, received 665.

The Second Ten consists of Arkansas, LSU, Michigan, Oklahoma State, Syracuse, Clemson, Georgia, Alabama, Colorado and Washington State.

The Top Twenty teams in the Associated Press college football poll, with first place votes in parentheses, season record through games of Nov. 5, total points based on 20-19-18-18-17-16-15-14-13-12-11-9-8-7-6-5-4-3-2-1 and previous ranking:

Police issue 300-400 tickets for speeding

By Amy Rosebrough
Collegian Reporter

Anyone who thinks the K-State Police give out thousands of speeding tickets each year will be interested to know this is not the case.

During an average year, 300 to 400 speeding tickets are given on campus, said Charles Beckom, campus police captain.

"(The number of tickets given) varies depending on if school is in session or not," he said. "It ranges from about 20 to 25 (per month) when school is in session."

The number of tickets increases during the two- to three-week period before the start of each semester, he said, but there is no time when speeding is predominant.

Although the University Traffic Board of Appeals has about 1,106 appeals of traffic tickets each year, speeding tickets are not included in the University appeals process. All speeding ticket appeals are sent to the Riley County Police Department.

Beckom said most people are caught speeding on Claflin Road, Anderson Avenue, Bluemont Avenue and Mid Campus Drive. All areas are watched and radar is used throughout the city at various times, he said.

Karen Lubben, county court clerk, said that during August, September and October, about 1,250 speeding tickets were issued in Manhattan.

"We don't pick on students, we don't pick on GIs. We just try to prevent accidents, and if they are in our way, that's their tough luck," said Lt. Scott Campbell of the RCPD.

Campbell said the main goal of traffic police is to prevent accidents. Most accidents are caused by either speeding or failing to yield the right-of-way.

No more time; campaign trails end

By The Associated Press

George Bush and Michael Dukakis sprinted for the finish line Monday in their marathon quest for the White House, the vice president confidently saying the nation was "coming in behind my candidacy" while his underdog rival vowed he'd spring a stunning "November surprise."

Both men raced across America in a final-day search for support while their campaigns spent nearly $1 million apiece on competing 30-minute evening appeals on network television. Bush, the leader in the polls, also aired a new five-minute commercial that sharply attacked his Democratic rival.

"It's in the hands of the gods and the American people," the vice president said before heading for Houston and the final rally of candidacy.

Dukakis was campaigning into overtime in a desperation drive for an upset. He told a crowd of 20,000 in California that voters would kick Bush "right out of our future."

Democrats expressed confidence they would command majorities in the 101st Congress that will govern alongside the new president. They also angled for modest gains in the dozen statehouse races on Tuesday's ballot.

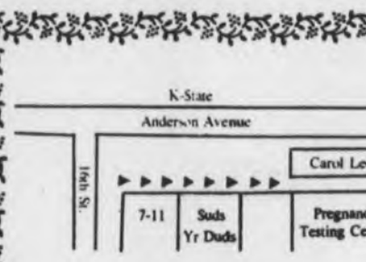
The final day of America's longest, costliest and — some said — nastiest presidential campaign left little room for subtlety.

Democratic vice presidential candidate Lloyd Bentsen appeared on stage in Texas with a caged quail — an obvious dig at his Republican rival, Dan Quayle.

Bush threw a stinging jab at Dukakis, saying, "We don't want to return to my opponent's favorite song: 'For all you do, this recession is for you.'"

Dukakis campaigned without letting up on his pledge to stand up for "average working families." Grabbing rest when he could on his plane, he flew to a sunrise political service in Cleveland, then a rally in St. Louis, where he was greeted by a band playing "Rock Around the Clock." Still to come was more campaigning on the West Coast and then another middle-of-the-night flight to an Iowa rally and election-morning appearances in Michigan.

"I don't need sleep, I'm charging," he said in Ohio. "We're going to win," he added, predicting a "November surprise" that would land him in the White House.



The polls said otherwise, and a few outside the Dukakis inner circle raised their voices to disagree. Pollster Lou Harris was one. He said Bush's margin was shrinking steadily.

But the last soundings by others made the vice president a favorite by anywhere from five to 12 points, and most surveys made his advantage in the Electoral College handsome, indeed.

The Associated Press' tabulation showed Bush ahead in states with 356 electoral votes, although he could not count securely on the 270 needed for victory. It showed Dukakis with 101 and another 81 in states rated as tossups, including Pennsylvania, Illinois and Missouri.

Bush flew from Michigan to Ohio, Missouri and finally toward Houston.

"That adrenalin is flowing. Our family's together. The country's coming in behind our candidacy. And I want to win this election," he said.

Wild bird center closes

By The Collegian Staff

The Prairie Raptor Project, one of the largest bird-of-prey rehabilitation centers in this part of the United States, closed recently.

The project was started 10 years ago and handled all types of birds of prey, including hawks, eagles and falcons, said Maure Weigel, founder and director of the project.

"It was the largest center in Kansas and one of the largest in the region," he said.

The center rehabilitated birds of prey that were injured or were too young to fly. It kept the birds in a semicontrolled environment until they could fend for themselves in the wild.

The plan of the project was aimed at reducing the birds' contact with humans. This kept the raptors from becoming dependent on humans and ensured their safe return to the wild.

The center would receive and handle any raptor species from all over the state, he said.

The birds were held in a long cage which would encourage them to try to fly, Weigel said.

"We try to have as little contact as possible with the birds," he said.

The center handled more than 1,300 raptors during the time it was open and rehabilitated about 250 birds a year.

The center was a nonprofit organization with a budget of $2,000 to $5,000 per year.

of available departmental resources and faculty," he said. "The department has just started its efforts to better utilize the faculty into areas of greater student demand."

Stroh, who came to K-State to head the art department in July 1980 from Coe College in Cedar Rapids Iowa, said he is planning to stay at K-State, but is considering taking a sabbatical from teaching.

"I've never had a sabbatical in 22 years of teaching," Stroh said. "It's about time to take one."

Stroh said he has applied for a Fulbright Fellowship as an artist in residence at the Delhi School of Art, New Delhi, India.

No details have been confirmed regarding the fellowship, he said.

Thomas Isenhour, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, said, "Stroh has made a number of major contributions to his department and the University."

Isenhour said it is not unusual for administrators to step down after serving a number of years as departmental heads.

"The option is always open to return to teaching," he said. "Our colleagues actually deserve the option of stepping down."

Isenhour said he doesn't view resignations as tragedies, but as opportunities for others to provide new leadership, ideas and imagination.

Isenhour is conducting an internal search within the art department for a new department head.

The College of Arts and Sciences is conducting searches for five department heads — economics, biochemistry, chemistry, psychology and art.

"The basic thing in a project like this is to get an interaction between our countries," Kanemasu said. "They've been very impressed with what they saw and I hope we have the same chance to visit their country."

Kanemasu was also involved in the International Satellite Land Surface Climatology Project last summer. More than 75 top research scientists from the United States, France, Canada and England made ground measurements at Konza Prairie.

The $3 million NASA project, which the scientists were following up on Monday, increased scientists' ability to interpret remote-sensing data from satellites on soil conditions and plant growth.

Voters prefer neither candidate

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Large segments of the public have been telling the pollsters they wish somebody else, almost anybody else, were running for the presidency. That's a warning sign.

Here's another: The two who are running have not spelled out much of what they aim to achieve. "Good jobs and good wages" or "a kinder, gentler America" are too vague to pass into law.

Yet a third: Neither Michael Dukakis nor George Bush command anything like the personal loyalty that Ronald Reagan attracted. Their campaigns were at once tough and lackluster. On top of that, if Bush wins he'll likely have to deal with Democrats controlling both houses of Congress.

Difficult problems await the next president, especially in the economy: The deficit. The trade imbalance. The crisis in the savings and loan industry. Debt in the Third World, which could threaten the American banking system. The prospect of a recession.

So the question arises whether the winner of the presidency on Tuesday will have trouble presiding. Will he have a mandate? Will he have a honeymoon? Will a candidate who has failed to arouse much enthusiasm on the stump be able to mobilize support for his programs and rally the nation to back the decisions he will have to make?

People who wonder about these questions seem divided.

"They are both potentially quite weak presidents," says Curtis Gans of the Committee for the Study of the American Electorate, a group that analyzes voting patterns. "They get elected with two problems, one of which is no strong feelings for them and the second no substantive mandate for action."

However, Victor S. Kamber, a Democratic political consultant, isn't among the worriers.

"We are not at war. We don't need a rallying cry around the White House and the presidency. We just need to keep moving, and that will happen."

Neither Dukakis nor Bush has filled the campaign with specific commitments.

"I can't look back and I can't look forward beyond Nov. 8 either — unifocus," Bush said late in the campaign.

This "unifocus" bothers Peggy Downes, a professor of political science at Santa Clara University in California who argues that being president requires different characteristics than are needed for modern-day campaigning.

"The way the candidates carry on the campaign has devalued the race for the presidency, and I think, the presidency itself, and I think it takes away from their power once in office," Downes said in an interview.

Journalist Elizabeth Drew, writing in The New Yorker magazine, reached a somber conclusion.

"At this point, it is hard to see how either candidate can be an effective leader — will be able to build and hold enough public support to take the country through a difficult passage," Drew said.

"Both of them got nominated by utilizing smart tactics and superior resources, and by the failings of their competitors, but these things fall short of what is required of a national leader."

Lloyd Bentsen said if he and Dukakis lose, congressional Democrats won't gang up on Bush. But he also spoke of the sort of ill will that sometimes counts for votes on Capitol Hill.

"Not gang up, no, but I don't think he gets any brownie points, the kind of campaign he's run. It's been an extremely negative one," Bentsen said. He told interviewers on NBC, "Frankly, I don't think either candidate at this point has a serious mandate."

Bush wins presidential election

From Staff and Wire Reports

Vice President George Bush was elected the nation's 41st president on Tuesday, sweeping past Michael Dukakis to assure four more years of Republican rule in the White House. Democrats countered with decisive control of both houses of Congress.

"Obviously, it feels good," the president-elect said as he received the nation's verdict in his adopted hometown of Houston. Asked when he would get down to the work of forming a government, Bush replied, "Tomorrow."

Dukakis offered his concession first in a private telephone call, then later at a nationally-televised rally with supporters in Boston. "The nation must work together," he said.

Bush planned a Wednesday morning news conference and then a triumphant return to Washington. He received a late-night call of congratulations from President Reagan, as did vice president-elect Dan Quayle of Indiana.

Dukakis now returns to work as governor of Massachusetts.

Victory for Bush came shortly after 11 p.m. EST in The Associated Press tabulation.

Bush — a pragmatic conservative who led Dukakis since August in the pre-election polls — won Quayle's Indiana to get off to a running start Tuesday night, then blazed uncontested across Dixie. He won Ohio, Michigan, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Texas — five key states which had been crucial to Dukakis' hopes for a "November surprise."

Missouri put Bush over the top in the AP tally.

Rod Olsen, losing democratic candidate for 22nd State Senate District, said of the national presidential election results, "I think it was showing pretty much what everyone expected."

Joseph Unekis, K-State associate professor of political science, said, "No surprise, Bush was ahead in the polls."

It was a singular triumph for Bush, but ticket-splitting voters delivered a strongly Democratic majority for the incoming 101st Congress.

Democrats appeared to be padding their margin in the Senate, and were marching solidly toward renewed command of the House. They appeared to be adding to their ranks of governors, as well.

Dukakis, whose hopes for an upset faded as his rival piled up the precious electoral votes, won at home in Massachusetts. He also won West Virginia, Rhode Island and the District of Columbia and led in nine states, including New York, Pennsylvania and Illinois.

In the popular vote, with 75 percent of the precincts reporting, Bush had 36,856,596 or 54 percent. Dukakis had 31,220,890 or 46 percent.

It wasn't close where it counted, in the electoral votes. Bush had 352 and led for 71 more. Dukakis had 80 and led for 17 as the vote counts moved toward the Pacific Coast.

Democratic vice presidential candidate Lloyd Bentsen had his Senate seat to go home to. He won handily as Democrats moved out smartly to renewed control in Congress.

Republican Senate Leader Bob Dole conceded a new, probably stronger Democratic majority, and in an extraordinary declaration, said Bush bore some of the blame.

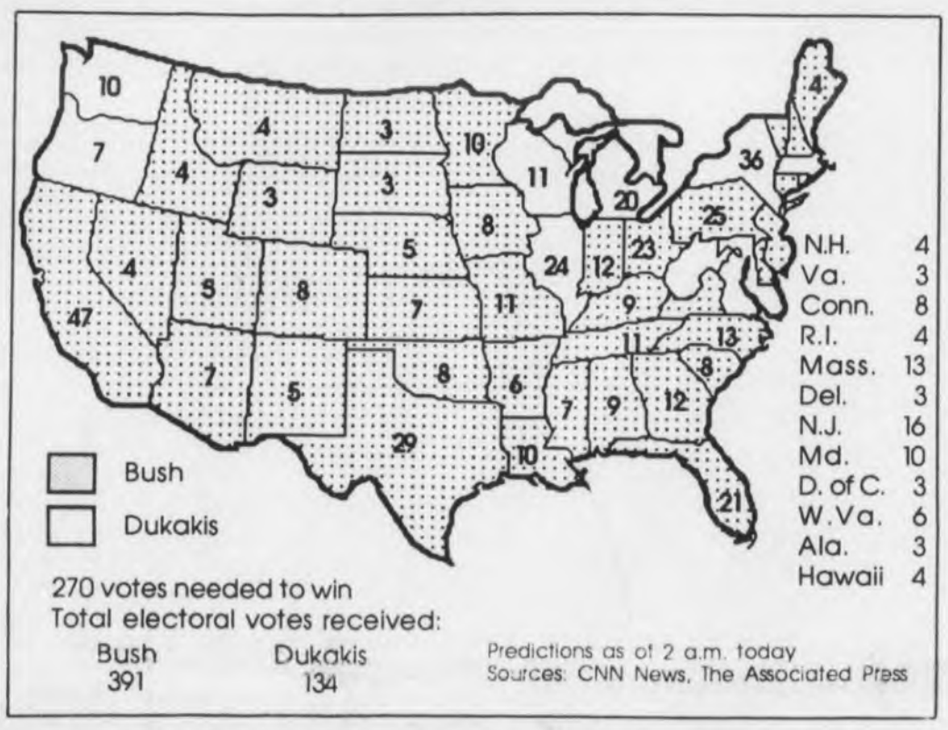
"I must say we could have used a little help from the vice president in some of those states — Florida. We pleaded with them to go to Florida," where a close race was unfolding.

Dole, assuming a Bush triumph, said it was "probably correct" that there wouldn't be a mandate to go along with it. But that wasn't the Reagan view. In a statement, he said of Bush and Quayle: "Their mandate will continue the changes that create jobs, prosperity and peace for all Americans."

"This has been a long and vigorous campaign," Reagan noted. "Governor Dukakis and Senator Bentsen represented their party with strength and tenacity. Now we must pull together and help the vice president lead America into the 1990s. I look forward to working with George and his team on a smooth transition."

The most prominent Republican Senate casualty was in Connecticut, where three-term Lowell Weicker fell to Jospeh Lieberman.

Former Democratic Gov. Robert Kerrey defeated incumbent David Karnes in Nebraska while Charles Robb claimed an open seat from the Republicans in Virginia. Herbert Kohl kept a Wisconsin seat in the Democratic column.



Rep. Buddy MacKay led narrowly in Florida as Democrats worked to replace one Democratic senator with another.

Republican House Whip Trent Lott claimed a Senate seat for the GOP in Mississippi, while in Vermont, Rep. James Jeffords kept a Senate seat in Republican hands.

Not even Republicans had dreamed of upsetting the Democratic majority in the House, and few incumbents of either party were in difficulty.

Rhode Island's Fernand J. St Germain, accused of ethics lapses, was a striking

Stephan will not resign

By Erwin Seba
Senior Staff Writer

TOPEKA — Attorney General Robert T. Stephan said during a Tuesday afternoon news conference that he will remain in office.

Speculation in the news media had suggested Stephan might resign following the findings of a federal court jury Monday.

The jury found Stephan had breached a contract to not disclose the terms of an out-of-court settlement of a sexual harassment lawsuit brought against him six years ago by a former employee of his office.

In its verdict, the jury awarded Marcia Tomson Stingley $200,000 in actual damages, but rejected Stingley's argument that publicity surrounding Stephan's disclosure at an Oct. 29, 1985, news conference had shown her in a "false light."

At the 1985 news conference, Stephan and a political associate, former state Sen. Bob W. Storey of Topeka, disclosed that Stingley was paid $24,000 to settle the 1982 sexual harassment suit.

"I am gratified that a federal court jury has exonerated me from allegations of sexual harassment as shown by the jury's refusal to return a verdict for libel or slander based on the false light theory," Stephan said.

"Truth is an absolute defense," he said, "and the jury found that my denial of the allegations was the truth."

Stephan said he never considered resigning following the jury's decision.

"The only people thinking that very strongly were in the media and some politicians," he said.

As to the disclosure which brought about Stingley's breach-of-contract suit, Stephan said he made it at the insistence of the media and members of the Legislature.

"I continue to believe that disclosure was in the public interest and I regret that (the settlement) wasn't disclosed immediately," Stephan said.

Publicity surrounding the settlement was the reason Stephan abandoned a race for governor in 1986.

Stephan said he would take further legal action in regard to the jury's award.

"I plan to file a motion to point out to the court that the jury was not informed of what properly constituted damages in a breach-of-contract suit," he said.

Actual damages in a suit should be limited to those actually sustained by the plaintiff, he said.

"I was surprised by the verdict and astounded by the amount of the award," Stephan said. "I don't think (the damages) could hardly have been that much."

Stingley, who was a file clerk in Stephan's office until 1982, had sought $5.2 million in the lawsuit.

Kansans pass amendment

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A constitutional amendment changing the year in each decade in which the Kansas Legislature will be required to redistrict itself was approved by the state's voters Tuesday.

With more than a third of the vote tabulated, the amendment had 201,188 yes votes, or 62 percent, with 125,807 no votes.

There was no organized opposition to the amendment and legislative leaders had urged its adoption.

The amendment changes from the ninth year of a decade to the second year of a decade when state lawmakers will have to reapportion the state Senate and House of Representatives.

The change will enable the state to utilize the decennial U.S. Census figures for its reapportionment of the Legislature in 1992, 2002, 2012, etc.

In reapportioning the districts, the Legislature would not count military personnel who were not residents of the state and non-resident college students.

College students who are residents of the state would be counted in the district of their residence and not in the district where they attend college.

Presently, the constitution requires the Legislature to reapportion itself in 1989, 1999, 2009, etc.

Since the state abandoned its old agricultural census in 1979, it had to conduct a special one-time census this year to provide updated figures for redistricting the Legislature next year.

A federal court panel had warned the Legislature not to reapportion itself in 1989 using 9-year-old U.S. Census figures from 1980, saying they were so outdated they would violate the one-man, one-vote principle.

The amendment will allow the state to avoid having to conduct its own census in the future.

Crew members survive crash

By The Associated Press

ABILENE, Texas — A B-1 bomber crashed Tuesday and all four crew members ejected safely, one man getting out seconds before the crash, the Air Force said.

"All of them were taken to the Dyess hospital and are in good condition," said Air Force spokesman Linda Gellnere of Dyess Air Force Base, where the long-range military bomber was based. The plane crashed about 3:30 p.m., roughly eight miles northwest of here.

Lou Paulsen of Abilene, who witnessed the crash, said the plane appeared to be making a normal flight away from the base when smoke starting coming out a left engine as the craft was circling.

"At first there was just a puff of smoke, then fire," said Paulsen, who was about two miles away. "It looked like it started to go out, then it flared

Polish workers go on strike

GDANSK, Poland — Workers in two shipyards went on strike Tuesday in support of the doomed Lenin Shipyard, and they defied an appeal by Solidarity leader Lech Walesa to go back to work.

Walesa, meanwhile, said he might begin talks with the government without receiving a guarantee by the authorities for the continued operation of the yard — the birthplace of the banned trade union.

Several hundred impatient young workers began strikes Tuesday morning at the Wisla and Repair shipyards in Gdansk to protest the scheduled Dec. 1 closing of the Lenin Shipyard.

Strikers said they had waited long enough for the authorities to start talks promised to consider the banned union's future.

"This is a warning to the authorities that we want the government to set about talks right away," said Jan Stanecki, strike leader at the 1,000-worker Wisla yard, which makes yachts and small craft.

Stanecki said 400 to 500 workers at the yard supported the strike. As evening fell, some strikers huddled over fires at the gates roasting sausages and half a dozen police vans drove up to seal off the shipyard. Temperatures were around freezing.

Rescuers reach China villages

BEIJING — Army rescuers and medical teams finally reached stricken villages Tuesday in a remote area near Burma where China's worst earthquake in more than a decade killed at least 930 people last weekend.

Official Beijing radio said more than 100 people had been rescued from the rubble of collapsed buildings and many more were believed to be trapped.

It said 1,000 soldiers were involved in the rescue operation and the central government had allocated $53.6 million.

Sunday night's temblor registered 7.6 on the Richter scale, indicating a quake of tremendous destructive force. It was centered in Lancang and Menglian counties of Yunnan province, about 240 miles southwest of Kunming, the provincial capital.

More than 170 aftershocks had been felt by Tuesday afternoon but their strength was declining, said Li Xianhu of the State Seismology Bureau in Beijing.

About 14 counties were affected, covering 16,000 square miles in a long corridor near Yunnan's southwestern frontier with Burma.

Students fish for credit

VALDOSTA, Ga. — Scores of novice anglers are attracted to a course at Valdosta State College that allows students to earn college credits while fishing.

Titled Freshwater Fishing 315, the course is filled to capacity each quarter with students who want to bait hooks and reel in catfish, bluegill, perch and bass.

"It's a fun course," said instructor Lindy Evans, 45. "The homework is excellent — meaning go fishing."

Evans covers all the basics of the sport, from matching rods with reels to selecting appropriate fishing lines, lures, hooks and bait. His classes also focus on techniques for catching fish.

Before graduating from the course, students make one or two visits to fishponds in the area to test their skills.

Evans' two-credit-hour course is sponsored by the college's Physical Education Department as a leisure activity, a category that also includes such things as golf and tennis.

Firefighters battle 6-alarm blaze

WICHITA — Firefighters fought a six-alarm blaze just south of downtown Wichita for more than two hours Tuesday.

Flames leaped as high as 100 feet and thick black smoke was visible from more than 30 miles away.

The blaze at the Land Tool Co. began about 4:45 p.m. Neighbors walking in the area reported hearing what could have been a small explosion.

Fire equipment from every city fire station was called to the scene and off-duty firefighters were called in as a back-up measure to staff the stations.

The Land Tool buildings have been vacant since the company closed late in 1987. With nearly a block of street frontage, the buildings were a half-block deep. They were located in an industrial area that abuts an old neighborhood.

Several homes were evacuated at the height of the fire. More evacuations were expected because firefighters had electric power to the neighborhood cut off as a precaution.

The Midway-Kansas Red Cross chapter set up a temporary shelter in a Wichita School District building.

A Wichita Fire Department spokesman said it would be at least Wednesday afternoon before investigators could examine the fire scene to attempt to determine how the blaze started.

No damage estimate was available.

No injuries were reported.

Hospital sells frozen dinners

LAWRENCE — Want a take-out supper? Maybe the hospital could suit your palate.

Hospital food may not have the world's greatest reputation, but Lawrence Memorial Hospital, for one, is promoting a new frozen dinner that it says offers healthy, tasty and quick eating.

On Monday, the hospital began selling "Light and Right" dinners, created especially for sale through hospitals by Baxter Health Care of Chicago.

The meals, similar to those sold in grocery stores, are low in calories, sodium, fat and cholesterol, said Nancy Donahey, dietitian at the hospital.

She said the meals are largely for the convenience of people going home from the hospital on special diets.

"It may be the answer for their recuperation period when they are not able to get up and prepare meals," she said.

However, the dietary office at the hospital will sell the meals to the public as well. Hospital employees were recently treated to a sampling, and Judith Hefley, director of community relations, said, "I liked them, actually."

Group raises revenue forecast

TOPEKA — The Consensus Estimating Group Tuesday raised its forecast of how much revenue state government can expect to take in this fiscal year by $166.3 million.

The $2.198 billion now expected to be collected in the fiscal year which began last July 1 and ends next June 30 represents an 8.2 percent increase over the $2.113 billion the estimators projected last April, when they set the final estimate of revenue for the 1988 Legislature.

Besides upgrading substantially the forecast for Fiscal Year 1989 revenue, the group — made up of state fiscal experts and university economists — estimated state general fund revenues for Fiscal Year 1990 at $2.321 billion, up 5.6 percent from the $2.198 billion the state now expects to take in this fiscal year.

The bulging revenues are the result of a combination of an improving state economy and the fact Gov. Mike Hayden and the Legislature returned less than 40 percent of an income tax windfall the state realized because of federal tax reform.

Candidates address issues
Student representation stressed

By Michael Nichols
Government Editor

In their final debate before the student body presidential election, candidates Laurian Cuffy and John McIntyre both stressed the need for better representation in student government for various campus groups.

Conducted in the Union Courtyard Tuesday, the debate was attended by about 150 people, and was sponsored by the Union Program Council Issues and Ideas committee.

Both candidates said poor representation of various campus groups is a problem hindering student government and one which needs to be addressed by the next student body president.

"If we don't have an attitude to reach out to (a student body of) diversified groups — international, nontraditional and minority students — there cannot be adequate representation," said Cuffy, senior in management.

McIntyre, senior in industrial engineering, responded by saying, "The student body president is the elected representative of the students — all the students. He must look at the big picture. If he has a narrow mind, his decisions will reflect that."

Three main issues affecting students are an "obvious animosity between student government and the Collegian," a more active presidential cabinet and a lack of evaluation of the campus police, McIntyre said.

Cuffy emphasized the importance of strong leadership in student government.

"We have tiptoed around the issue of leadership," Cuffy said. "We ought to have some type of focus on what leadership we want for a diversified student body. My campaign reflects the diversity we need."

McIntyre called the Margin of Excellence plan "not perfect by any means," and said it was a matter that needed to be looked into further.

"Students need to look at what it would do to us if we had enhanced admissions. The restrictions are a little out of line," he said.

Cuffy praised open admissions, citing personal experience of friends who received an education at K-State, when they may not have been accepted at other universities.

"K-State is unique because you can come here and you won't be turned away," he said.

In response to a question from a member of the audience concerning possible community issues that need to be addressed by the next student body president, McIntyre said off-campus housing was the most pressing.

"Housing is pitiful," he said. "There are places where students live where nobody should be forced to live. We're not going to settle for anything less than adequate housing. It is the No. 1 community issue."

Cuffy said a shuttle service is needed to aid the parking problem on campus. He stressed the importance of K-State to the community, and said the problem could be solved if both parties worked together.

"We need to have some sort of shuttle system to get students from point A to point B," he said. "It is time student leadership went to the Manhattan community and said 'Hey, we need a shuttle system, and you can help.'"

Both candidates said the proposed engineering fee amounts to an increase in tuition, and that the matter was handled very poorly by the College of Engineering.

In his closing statement, Cuffy repeated his campaign theme of "unity and growth."

Staff/Greg Vogel

Student body presidential candidate Laurian Cuffy answers a question during the debate Tuesday in the Union Courtyard as his opponent John McIntyre listens. The runoff election will be today.

"We have an extremely fragmented student body," he said. "When you bring together these fragments, you have a diversity of argument, and you get growth. I want a student government that reaches out to all students."

McIntyre said the position of student body president requires the right type of leader.

"A diverse student body will demand a leader with strong communication skills. The most important aspect of the job of student body president is to deal with situations as they develop over the year."

Audience members asked questions and applauded over the course of the debate.

"It was a little weak," said Jason Brown, sophomore in speech.

Presidential candidates outline office plans

Cuffy stresses theme of vision, goal of equitable representation

By Paul Branson
Staff Writer

A leader should have a vision he believes, and Laurian Cuffy, senior in management and runoff candidate for student body president, said he has a vision for K-State.

"We need, collectively as a student body, to show our peer institutions that we have a theme and a goal," Cuffy said.

"This theme is bringing a diverse group of people with diverse needs together to solve problems effectively on our campus."

Cuffy was born in Trinidad, a small island country in the Caribbean, in 1962. He and his family moved to Delaware nine years later, where he attended school. His parents sent him back to Trinidad where they believed he could get a better education.

Cuffy returned to the United States and spent his senior year in high school here. Upon graduation, he entered the military at the age of 17.

"I went into the army to fund my education, but it also allowed me to see the world and receive and pursue leadership positions," he said.

"I really stand behind the army," Cuffy said. "I matured, I'm now a focused person who focuses on my goals.

"(Running for student body president) has been a lot of hard work, but it's been fun too. I've learned a lot about myself."

Cuffy said his experiences have also affected the way he looks at his vision.

"I recall going to the greek organizations. I was prepared by my staff as to what to expect but it really wasn't the culture shock I expected," he said. "I got this picture of all these people looking at me and I thought, 'Should I be intimidated?'

"But I started flowing and I felt my message was so pure, I mean unity and growth is a pure thought, so I didn't feel threatened and I didn't threaten them," he said.

Cuffy has served as secretary for American Collegian Entrepreneurs, vice president for the Black Student Union, ambassador for Minority Business Students in Action, and as Troy Lubbers' cabinet member for

Library concerns McIntyre

Despite George Bush's attempt to make "liberal" a dirty word, student body presidential candidate John McIntyre said he is not afraid to label himself as such.

"I tend to be more on the liberal side on all issues. I like to call it open-mindedness," said McIntyre, senior in industrial engineering.

McIntyre said he sees the role of a student body president as not just one role, but as many.

"(The role is) really diverse. At times you're called upon to be a leader and representative, finding out concerns of students. You're also a spokesperson, reflecting those concerns to the Board of Regents, the Legislature and others.

"(The student body president) is also an ambassador, when he speaks to alumni and prospective students, being a prominent window.

"Finally, he or she is still a student, and needs to maintain contact with students," he said.

Despite the time demands, McIntyre said he is planning on remaining as a member of Marlatt Hall's staff if elected as student body president.

"I talked with Director of Housing Thomas Frith about the situation. He assured me that he felt I was responsible enough (to handle both positions). He encouraged me to run, because it would demonstrate that role models and leaders do come from residence halls," he said.

Increasing representation in Student Senate from residence halls, non-traditional and minority students is one of his top priorities in this campaign, he said in the Nov. 6 debate at the Union.

The issue of apathy among students is a major concern to McIntyre.

"It's not just minority groups on campus, but also within living groups. It's been a tradition; they've never had any role models to follow," he said.

"Without the realization of their importance to campus, they develop a certain apathy. That's the problem," he said.

McIntyre sees progress being made in representation, but thinks responsibility for change lies with student government.

"I very much think it's going to be the student government's responsiblity to rigorously approach these groups and make them aware that they can make an impact. We need to give them some ownership in the sys-

Computer virus: Malady earns wrong name

In the not-so-distant future, the word "virus" will replace names like "commie," "traitor," "arbitrager," "inside trader" and so on. Statements such as, "he's a virus (commie)," or "that virus (traitor) betrayed his country," will soon be on the lips of the general public. No other person or thing, other than Dan Quayle, has taken so much pounding at the hands of the media as viruses have.

OK, viruses cause diseases like measles, mumps, poliomyelitis, rubella and AIDS. But when computer scientists call some notorious programs "computer viruses," they are blaming viruses for something they did not do.

This week, the media are taking a big shot at computer viruses. I am sure that you are aware of that and may even be tired of hearing about the recent attack of a computer virus on computer systems at government establishments, businesses and universities all over the nation, including K-State. But for the sake of the virus community, I have decided to clear up some misconceptions about real viruses and computer viruses.

First, some qualitative similarities between the two. Both biological and computer viruses spread in epidemic proportions, and both become active when they invade the territory of a host. Both have numerous types, both take control of the system of the host and both are capable of making perfect copies of themselves. But a comparison of computer viruses and biological viruses on the basis of physical characteristics reveals no astounding similarity between the two.

A biological virus is a single- or double-stranded nucleic acid core surrounded by a protein coat. Some viruses have outer envelopes composed of fatty material and carbohydrates. A computer virus, on the other hand, is a short computer program designed to disrupt the workings of a computer system. When this destructive code is executed within a useful program, it propagates and infects other programs which run on the same machine. The problem gets graver when the computer employs the same core memory to store both the data used by programs and instructions for running those programs. In this case, a program can be written to consume programs instead of data.

Commentary

SHEIKH FAISAL RAZZAQ

Collegian Columnist

Computer viruses are created. Why would well-educated computer scientists create such nuisances? I guess there are good and bad guys among computers scientists, too.

Computer viruses, like biological viruses, are of several types. In an article titled "Computer Viruses" published in the May-June 1988 issue of American Scientist, the author classifies the harmful programs into four categories: the worm, the trojan horse, the bacterium and the virus. If you like to know more about their nature, I would encourage you to read the above-mentioned article.

The epidemic nature of these destructive programs threatens the workings of a large number of institutions and individuals in American society. Electronic Funds Transfer System in the banking industry, NASA, the IRS, corporations, the Pentagon, research and development operations, and defense systems rely heavily on the use of computers. Due to this extensive reliance on computers, a major breakout of an epidemic can cause millions or even billions of dollars in damage to society in the cost of retrieving the information and restoring the utility of the computers.

But not everybody will be affected by computer viruses. Farrell Library is indefinitely immune to any damage by a computer virus, because its computer has been down since times unknown. So you were not unduly forced to write the titles, call numbers, ID numbers and volume numbers of books you checked out.

When the thought of disease comes to mind, the first response is, "Can it be prevented?" If there were a Computer Scientist General like the Surgeon General, he would have stated, "The best protection against the computer virus is the use of condoms." Unfortunately, there are no condoms for computer diskettes. But there are some programs available which immunize computers against computer viruses. Such software is not always foolproof and is not necessarily effective against all destructive programs.

For the time being, the best protection against computer viruses is prevention. There are bound to be some misconceptions about how a computer virus is spread. A computer virus is not spread by casual contact of the computers. It is only when computers become electronically active that computer viruses can spread.

So the next time you slide any diskette in that slot, you may want to take some preventive measures. These measures call for the use of software produced and sealed by the manufacturer, restricting the users of PC's to the owner only, checking for the presence of any virus in the program and scrutinizing programs which take unusually large chunks of computer memory.

Old campaign signs no better than litter

The day after.

When the polls close and the election season is over, candidates — winners and losers — eventually find their way home. So do the voters.

The following morning, the excitement is gone, but not forgotten — thanks to leftover posters, signs, fliers and campaign materials scattered throughout the streets of Manhattan.

In contrast, the aftermath of K-State's student government election is something quite different.

Because University candidates are responsible for the removal of any posted campaign materials, the campus is not cluttered with torn candidates' faces and campaign promises. The taste of the election does not linger on like the taste of a $2 pizza. The campaign material ends when the voting does.

The city should consider a comparable policy.

After the elections, these materials are no longer communicating a message. They are just like every other piece of litter on the streets. They don't serve any purpose after the ballots are cast, so they should be considered equal to trash.

The city has laws against littering and unsightliness. Those laws should also apply to displayed campaign materials when it is no longer election time.

Collegian Editorial Policies

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR are always encouraged. Those which pertain to matters of campus and/or public interest are especially encouraged, and are given the highest priority.

Letters should be kept as brief as possible, preferably under 300 words. Those who cannot condense their opinions should consider submiting their letter in the form of a guest column. All letters are subject to editing for space, style and taste.

GUEST COLUMNS are also encouraged. The column should be no longer than two double-spaced, typed pages. If the submission is used as a column and not a letter to the editor, it will be accompanied by the author's photograph.

SEND SUBMISSIONS to the Collegian in Kedzie 116.

UNSIGNED EDITORIALS represent the consensus opinion of the Collegian's editorial board. Opinion columns do not necessarily reflect the opinions of the Collegian management, Student Publications, Inc. or the newspaper staff in general.

Committee in error

Editor,

It upset me greatly to read in Monday's Collegian that Laurian Cuffy's name appeared on the ballot for student body president despite his failure to submit a campaign expenditure report before the Oct. 31 deadline. Ira Bolden, Cuffy's campaign manager, apparently gave Eva Chatterjee sufficient explanation for the tardiness of the report and Cuffy's name remained on the ballot.

This upsets me, for I too failed to submit my report on time and my name was stricken from the ballot, forcing me to run as a write-in candidate. Also, I was given no opportunity to discuss my late report.

Chatterjee is the chairwoman of the election committee. Her position dictates an understanding of and compliance with the Student Governing Association's election policies. No exceptions should be allowed. I applaud Brad McMillan's resignation from the election committee and feel his reap ointment to the committee, in Chatterjee's position, is essential.

Liquor laws tough

Editor,

This letter goes out to all those students who like to drink in bars before they turn 21 years old. Many of you are aware of the incredible number of students who get ticketed for being a minor in possession of alcoholic liquor. This seemingly harmless infraction of the law packs a hefty fine of $114! From personal experience I can tell you that it hurts pretty bad to write such a large check to Riley County District Court just for having a glass of beer in a place other than my own house or car.

Here comes the good part. I received a letter from the Division of Alcoholic Beverage Control telling me that I have to quit my job as a bartender because it is illegal for me to "dispense" liquor due to my conviction of more than a year ago. Is this crazy or what? I'm of legal age now and they are making me quit my job.

With the multitude of students who have willingly shelled out cash for this, the county has most definitely accumulated several thousands of dollars. I guess that's why they can afford to lose the tax money out of my paycheck by having me, a person making money for college, fired. Hopefully this injustice can be stopped, but until then, avoid the ABC.

Lighting problems

Editor,

I have greatly admired Faisal Razzaq's Collegian columns this semester, especially the one which deals with an issue that should concern all of us: campus ligthting. Razzaq mentioned in his article that he learned from me that students, faculty and police are responsible for reporting broken or nonfunctioning outdoor lamps and light fixtures. I got that information from Jack Watson, assistant director of facilities maintenance.

My immediate reaction was to doubt that the system of reporting burned-out light bulbs was very efficient, but wanting to be a useful campus citizen I decided to put it to a test.

Recently I've altered my morning run to include a tour through campus before dawn, and see for myself the number of lights that are broken or burned out. In my conversation with Watson, I told him the best lighted area on campus (the east and south side of Durland Hall) had eleven burned out bulbs. Watson made note and said he'd take care of it. That was weeks ago.

I went by Durland Hall on the morning of Friday, Oct. 28, and there are now 19 lights burned out. My suspicion is that a well-maintained outdoor lighting system is not high on the University's priority lists, certainly not as high as new signs, sprinkler systems, new grass and abundant flowers. This is the most beautiful campus I've been on.

However, assuming that the University will figure out a way to replace and fix burned-out and broken fixtures in a timely manner, we are still left with an inefficient system of reporting. I suggest the University employ a work-study student for 10 hours a week, whose job is to find and report burned-out light bulbs. The cost to the University would be less than $50 a week. By not taking quick and positive action, the University could be risking a high dollar law suit as a result of its negligence.

Further, I think it is important that before Clarence Waters and a concerned group of architecture students measure the outdoor lighting illumination at K-State that all of the lighting fixtures be put in working order so that we have a fair assessment of whatever additional lighting may be needed.

Finally, I've come to the conclusion that many of the K-State administrators whose job it is to monitor and maintain the outdoor lighting rarely, if ever, walk through campus at night to see for themselves what many of us are talking about. If they did they would notice the two burned-out lamps between the chapel and the McCain lot, the one burned-out lamp south of McCain and the burned-out lamp in the Thompson Hall parking lot, to say nothing of the numerous burned-out lamps that are on at a very dim level, providing little illumination.

Currently, Laurian Cuffy has expressed the need for a better system of lighting maintenance and better lighting if it proves to be needed in order to make K-State a safer, more accessable campus at night. So, if you agree with my point of view you could express that agreement at the polls.

Or in the the spirit of the Myron A. Calhoun school of political activism you could let our president know you're concerned by simply clipping this letter out of the Collegian and send it via campus mail to President Jon Wefald, Anderson Hall. For those of you who need an envelope, please stop by my office, Nichols Hall, Room 139.

Let there be light!

Add more lights

Editor,

There have been many articles in the newspaper about the lighting on campus. This is a major concern of mine, and obviously a major concern to other students.

The lighting on campus is not sufficient for students to be walking at night. As a student, along with many others, who studies late into the evening, walking back home from Seaton and Nichols Halls is a scary experience.

Some pathways are so poorly lighted that I am not able to clearly see what is in front of me. I urge the administration to do something about this problem and to satisfy the demands of the students in getting sufficient lighting on campus.

Commission OKs enterprising zone

By Scot Dye
and Angie Smith
Collegian Reporters

During the Manhattan City Commission's special meeting Tuesday, the commissioners heard a request from the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce to invite a large manufacturing company to locate in Manhattan.

The commission voted unanimously to grant the company an enterprising zone to the building to help reduce the company's state tax. It also granted a utility rate abatement from KPL Gas Service and a reimbursement of $2,500 per job for moving expenses not to exceed $100,000.

The commission voted 3-1 to grant the company an abatement on real estate taxes during the next 10 years.

If the company receives the approval before Friday, it said it will be able to begin moving its heavy manufacturing equipment into Manhattan on Nov. 16, said Bill Boyd, president of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

The commission agreed to grant the company's request on the condition that the company makes an attempt to hire its employees from the Manhattan and Riley County area.

"We have the possibility of 45 or more jobs. I want to see them go to the Manhattan and Riley County citizens, that is who pays the taxes," said Gene Klingler, city commissioner.

The Chamber of Commerce has not yet released the name of the company, but Boyd explained what product the company will be manufacturing.

"This is an architectural product; it is used in construction work and it takes the place of thickly cut marble and granite which is used in buildings," he said.

The product is cut a quarter of an inch thick and laminated on aluminum honeycomb, Boyd said. Since it is lighter, it is easier to handle than marble or granite.

Language requirement considered

By Christina Doherty
Staff Writer

Although K-State doesn't have a general requirement of foreign language for every student, some members of the faculty and administration believe implementing this type of requirement could only benefit a student's education.

There are only four classes that every student must take. These classes are English Composition I and II, Public Speaking 1A or 1, and Concepts of Physical Education, said Jerry Freeman, professor of psychology and chairman of the Committee on Common University Degree Requirements.

To earn a bachelor of arts degree from the College of Arts and Sciences, students must complete four semesters of a foreign language.

"Nobody outside the college (of arts and sciences) has any foreign language requirements," said Brad Shaw, head of the Department of Modern Languages.

The Board of Regents is discussing the idea of having foreign language as a requirement for its universities, said Provost James Coffman.

There are two options being considered for foreign language requirements. The first would require students entering the universities to have at least two years of foreign language experience at the high school level, and if not, the students will not be admitted. The second option would require students who do not have foreign language experience to have it as a University requirement, Coffman said.

"We're presently taking a very in-depth look at the academic curriculum program here at K-State," he said.

The Committee on Common University Degree Requirements is a sub-committee of the Academic Affairs Committee of Faculty Senate. The purpose of this committee is to make recommendations for any changes in the degree requirements, Freeman said.

"My perspective (of the purpose of this investigation) is the question of what are the characteristics of an educated person, and what characteristics do we want them (the students) to have when they graduate?" He said.

This committee is in its third year of evaluating the present requirements, and at this point cannot say whether or not a requirement of foreign language will be made in the future by the University, Freeman said.

Because the University doesn't require students to take a foreign language, Shaw said he finds more of a positive attitude in the students enrolled in his classes.

"Because they have the option not to take it, we have more students (in the classes) who want to be there," Shaw said.

Coffman said modern languages are important.

"In my personal opinion, I think we need to have strength in modern languages, either students entering with a modern language background or have them be required to have some as a part of the general education requirement," he said.

Fine arts majors display work to graduate

By Melissa Paul
Collegian Reporter

Every semester after midterms, just a casual glance at any campus bulletin board will announce an art exhibit. These exhibits aren't by professionals, but K-State students.

All bachelor of fine arts majors are required to organize a public showing of their work as part of their curriculum.

Jere Dodge, senior in fine arts, recently displayed porcelain wall hangings in McCain.

The hangings are symbols of an imaginary culture, she said.

"I use my imagination and make up stories and build these pieces around whatever I'm thinking of," she said. "Seeing the works hanging on the wall in McCain, instead of my home, makes my work and years in college all fit together."

Katherine Hinkle, senior in fine arts, just finished her show in the Art Building's Gallery Six.

Hinkle displayed a variety of works including oil paintings, ceramics and silk screens that she has completed during her time at K-State.

"Part of my mind is asking how (I did all this)," she said. "And another part is saying it's all mine."

Alex Menez, senior in fine arts, said the idea behind the exhibits is that art is not made to be put in the closet, but to be shown to everybody.

Menez's concentration is graphic arts. His exhibit consisted of examples of letterheads, logo designs and a coordinated restaurant menu.

A graphic artist's exhibit is going to be different than the other fine arts displays, he said. The graphic artist is going to display the items that will be included in a portfolio.

The shows usually last about two weeks each, said James Munce, associate art professor. As soon as one show is completed, another will begin.

Presently, the works of six graphic artists are on display in McCain.

Munce, coordinator of senior exhibitions, said the students work with their major professor in picking the pieces to display.

Agriculture students plan summer jobs

By The Collegian Staff

Students in the College of Agriculture can learn how to get the most from their summers at a summer job and career planning meeting from 4 to 5 p.m. Wednesday in Throckmorton 132.

The purpose of the meeting is to call attention to the importance of summer job experiences and to inform students of various employment services available, said Jim Akin, associate director of the Career Planning and Placement Center.

"It's kind of a motivational thing in one sense and a how-to in another," Akin said.

The meeting is geared toward freshmen, sophomores and juniors in agriculture, but all students are welcome to attend, he said.

Four speakers will relate personal experiences and give advice on how to best use available resources in the search for a summer job, Akin said.

Robert Bennie, a local representative of Monsanto chemical company, will speak on career planning and career goal-setting.

Mike Legleiter, senior in agronomy, will provide insight on summer jobs from the perspective of a student who has completed a summer internship.

Beverly Tolbert, an office manager in the Career Planning and Placement Center, will inform students how to use the services offered by the Career Planning and Placement Center, including the procedures for interview sign-ups. Tolbert mainly works with students in the summer employment area, Akin said.

John Riley, assistant director of resident instruction for the College of Agriculture, will explain how to use resources in individual departments to aid in the search for summer employment.

Ag college reverses enrollment decline

By Becky Ives
Staff Writer

Although in the past decade the number of students enrolled in agriculture studies has declined, K-State is slowly reversing that trend.

Enrollment in the College of Agriculture dropped 34 percent from 2,344 to 1,540 between 1977 and 1987. In 1988, the enrollment increased by one to 1,541. Nationwide, the number of undergraduates in agriculture dropped 33 percent.

In addition to the small increase in this year's undergraduate enrollment, graduate enrollment has also increased. It has grown from 3,145 in 1987 to 3,316 in 1988, said Dave Mugler, associate dean of the College of Agriculture.

"We are very glad to see that," Mugler said. "We have quite a few faculty members at the retirement age and we need people to fill those positions."

This year, 13 new faculty members were hired because of the retirement of faculty, he said.

"Another good thing is that for the second year in a row, we are up in the numbers of freshmen and sophomores," Mugler said.

The U.S. Department of Agriculture estimates that through 1990, more than 8,000 agriculture-related jobs a year will be created but go unfilled for lack of qualified people.

Of the various curricula offered in the College of Agriculture, agricultural economics has suffered the largest decline. In 1987, the enrollment was 226, then dropped by 44 to 182 in 1988. The next highest decline was bakery science and management. Its enrollment fell by 16 to 37 in 1988.

Marc Johnson, head of the department of agricultural economics, said he would like to get the enrollment back up to 220 students.

"We went through a bubble when we went up to 282 students, then we started to decline," Johnson said. "We don't want 282 students. That is too many. With that many we get 80 or 90 people in the classroom, true-

"We have quite a few faculty members at the retirement age and we need people to fill those positions."

—Dave Mugler associate dean false and multiple-choice tests because that is all we have time for, and very few term papers.

"We can handle around 220 students and that is the number we would like to stabilize around."

In order to get more students enrolled in agricultural economics, Johnson said the department is sending brochures to junior colleges to inform students of the opportunities available within the curriculum. The brochures are being sent to employers to encourage them to hire K-State students.

"I don't understand why we had this big drop," Johnson said. "We've looked at a number of factors and there is no trend that explains why we had this blip."

Many students are not aware that all agricultural economics classes are taught by professors instead of graduate students. Also, each adviser councils 20 students, which means in-depth career planning for the students, he said.

Speech program receives top rating

By The Collegian Staff

Anyone receiving a master's degree in speech communication from K-State is graduating from one of the best programs in the region, according to an article appearing in the October 1988 issue of Communication Education.

The article, "Evaluation of Master's Programs in Speech Communication," listed the speech communication master's program at K-State in the top seven of 37 universities rated in the central region.

The article was based on a survey of 272 professionals across the nation. It was conducted by three Auburn University professors.

"The rating was a result of surveys sent to faculty and graduate students at schools all over the central states region," said Harold Nichols, head of the Department of Speech. "It's exciting. ... It's good for the department and recruiting."

The other six institutions receiving top recognition were: Illinois State University, the University of Illinois at Chicago, the University of Nebraska at Omaha, Northern Illinois University, Western Michigan University and the University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee.

Faculty Senate disapproves findings

By Nancy Prosser
Collegian Reporter

The K-State Faculty Senate on Tuesday failed to approve of the Faculty Senate Committee on University Planning's endorsement of the reorganization of the Graduate School.

A University task force report on Graduate School reorganization was submitted to FSCOUP and then given to Faculty Senate for approval.

The report included a plan to reorganize the administrative structure of K-State's programs in graduate education and research. The task force specifically found that "the current administrative structure (of graduate programs) at Kansas State University is decentralized and does not have a clear general research policy or unified supervisory control over graduate education and research."

Sen. John Keller, professor of regional and community planning and member of FSCOUP, said the committee endorsed a more structured graduate program.

"After initial objections, FSCOUP endorsed the efforts of the task force, and reorganizational changes suggested by the report," Keller said.

K-State is searching for an assistant provost who would be head of the graduate programs. About $150,000 has been allocated for the project.

"The architecture college has seen a 60 percent increase in students over the last four years, but has not received any additional monies. I don't see how, if budgets are so tight, we can suddenly create such a large budget for a position that has never been approved," said Mark Lapping, dean of the College of Architecture and Design.

After a lengthy discussion, the senators approved a motion that stated they received FSCOUP's report, but they did not approve it.

In other action, Senate President Cornelia Flora, professor of anthropology, urged the senators to volunteer to represent the Faculty Senate at Student Senate meetings.

"Student senators make the effort to come to our meetings," Flora said. "So I feel we can make the same concessions."

Senate approved a policy statement on the posting of grades. Students must give instructors written permission to post their grades. For the permission to be valid, it must be signed and dated.

Faculty using computer grading should ask students to sign the appropriate space to grant permission to post grades. Faculty wishing to post final examination and semester grades should ask the students to give their approval to post both grades.

Urban problems shock rural students

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — After spending a week in some of the city's worst neighborhoods, a class of mostly white, middle-class college students from Nebraska emerged with a wide range of emotions, from fear to sympathy to anger.

The 18 students from Hastings (Neb.) College were part of a unique assignment to educate future teachers about the difficulties faced by urban minorities, as well as the positive aspects of their cultures. The class aims to give the future teachers insight into what their students may be like.

On the grim side, they saw abused and neglected children, homeless people, drug busts, a single mother taking care of seven children in a one-room house.

"It's so easy to look the other way," said Kim Sperber, who grew up in a white, middle-class family in a Denver suburb. "I never had a reason to go down to the city, so I didn't."

"You may see some bums and some bag ladies, and that's enough. You don't want to see any more. You don't want to find out how bad it really is," said fellow classmate John Roebke. "People who live in suburbs or better areas are just isolated and ignorant that situations like that exist in their own cities."

The one-semester course at Hastings, which includes the trip to Kansas City, is led by associate education professor Jan Watkins.

"The majority of our students come from small-town and ranching families," Watkins said. "Even those who come from large urban areas do not look at the city and ethnic groups as this class forces them to do."

Their field trip was far from the ordinary tourist's excursion through the posh Country Club Plaza and Crown Center shopping districts.

From early morning to past sunset, the students visited minority schools, toured a shelter for the homeless, attended Sunday services at a black church, sat in on English-as-a-second-language classes, ate Mexican and soul food and watched counselors work with abused children.

They also rode the streets with Kansas City police officers.

"Everybody's blind to what's going on down there," student Scott Rezac said. "People wait until the last minute to do something; people wait to help the kids in detention until they're in detention. I didn't see one place for the kids to go at night, like a gymnasium or any (recreation) centers."

However, Roebke added, there's a $5 million elevated walkway at Crown Center "so people can walk across the street without getting their feet wet."

Considering the absence of places for youths to go, Rezac said, it isn't surprising kids turn to selling drugs.

"As soon as they reach that certain age, there's nothing around there," he said. "There are no jobs, they have to make money. Going out and selling crack, doing stuff that's illegal, that's a way of making money. That's the only thing they've got."

The class is called the Multi-Cultural Experience and is required of all education majors at Hastings, though Watkins said other students now are signing up for the class.

It started about eight years ago after national accrediting organizations told colleges to develop courses for a greater understanding of minority issues.

Hastings, a small liberal-arts college in south-central Nebraska, began participating in the multi-college project called the Cooperative Urban Teacher Education program. In the beginning, the course was offered only during the January break as an elective.

Hastings' education department then decided to require the course for all future teachers, regardless of their emphasis, and took to developing its own program.

Hair-care products' expense questioned

By Stephanie Morrill
Collegian Reporter

Professional hair-care products seem to be growing in popularity, but many people question whether the products are worth the added expense.

"I believe that there is a great difference between professional and non-professional products," said Kent Yeager, hair stylist for Haynes Style Shop.

Yeager completed a two-year cosmetology program at Jacksonville (Fla.) Junior College and has been a licensed cosmetologist for about 10 years.

"There are a number of little reasons why professional hair-care products are better for your hair, but the biggest reason is the amount of alkali," said Charles Crum, owner of Crum's Beauty College.

"There is just too much alkali in store-bought products and this can be very damaging to your hair," Crum said.

Alkalinity is a rating of the pH level in hair-care products. High alkali ratings can cause hair to become very dry and flyaway, he said.

Grocery stores carry many brands of hair-care products, "but basically, there isn't any difference between them," Yeager said.

"About 90 percent of the research done and money spent on developing a non-professional shampoo is spent in advertising the product.

"So many people go through the shampoo section in a store and remove the caps from the bottles and smell the product," he said. "If they like the way it smells, they buy it — regardless of how damaging it can be to their hair."

"The basic difference between professional and retail products is (that) the retail products are more oriented toward sensory features, such as smell and color of the product, whereas the professional products are more oriented toward performance aspects, like cleansing," said Jerry Newell, research and development marketer of consumer products for the Helene Curtis Company.

Helene Curtis produces professional, as well as retail, products.

"The professional products are better only for the beauticians because the products are aimed at their needs and abilities," Newell said.

"The retail products are better for the average consumer for the same reason," he said.

Usually, professional hair-care products can only be purchased from authorized sellers.

"The company which produces the professional products wants its products to be sold in professional settings," Crum said, "not in discount stores.

Yeager said people who want to determine the difference between professional and non-professional products in their hair should try professional products for one week, then switch.

Shultz urges realistic dealings with Soviets

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Secretary of State George P. Shultz on Tuesday urged the next U.S. president to be realistic and deal with the Soviet Union when it is in America's self-interest.

"We shouldn't be afraid to do it," he said in an election day speech to young political leaders from around the world.

He praised the reform efforts of Soviet President Mikhail S. Gorbachev and said that, if Gorbachev succeeds, "the Soviet Union will be a very different place."

But later, opening an exhibit of a Soviet photographer, Sergey Petrov, who is barred from leaving his country, Shultz criticized emigration restrictions.

"We will continue to press hard for Sergey's release as long as he is held against his will," Shultz said.

Petrov was denied a visa on the grounds he worked in a physics laboratory years ago. The photographer and his mother also were refused permission to attend the exhibition of his work at the State Department.

"At least I feel when my works get out part of me gets out too," Petrov said in a letter to a friend that Shultz quoted.

In his foreign policy speech, Shultz said Gorbachev and his supporters "deserve credit for recognizing the problems and trying to solve them."

As a result, he said, "the environment for democratic values, peace and freedom is probably healthier than it has been for some time."

Within the Reagan administration, Shultz has played a leading role in promoting arms-control agreements with Moscow and seeking other ways to reduce tensions.

His speech, which had the earmarks of a valedictory, was aimed at presidential candidates Michael Dukakis and George Bush as well as foreign leaders.

He said whether Bush or Dukakis won, the United States should be vigilant in dealing with the Soviet Union. "We're going to be realistic but, at the same time, pragmatic."

Hochhauser wins over Knopp

By Amy Lyons
Collegian Reporter
and Kendra Gensemer
Staff Writer

Democrat Sheila Hochhauser celebrated her election victory Tuesday over incumbent Joe Knopp, Kansas House majority leader, with a crowd of supporters chanting "Sheila, Sheila, Sheila."

Hochhauser, a practicing Manhattan attorney, focused her campaign on Knopp's record and it paid off.

"He did a good job for the 67th District for a long time. I do commend him for that," Hochhauser said about her opponent.

In a plea for an "objective watchdog," Knopp said Hochhauser created issues without anyone asking their origins.

"(Hochhauser's) ability to focus on a few issues and the inability of anyone to ask any fundamental questions was probably the key," he said. "We needed an objective watchdog."

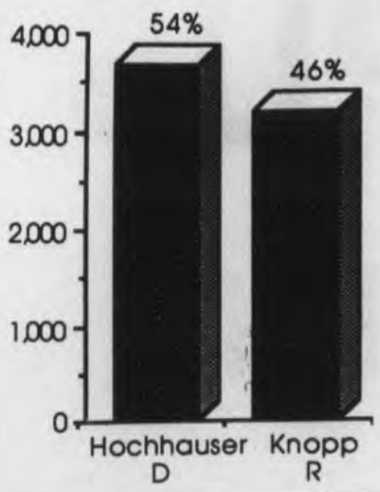
Hochhauser said Knopp was not representing the district and wants to make it clear that she wants "to represent the Republicans, the Democrats and the independents."

Knopp, in a post-return visit to a reception for Democrats, said now was the time for Republicans and Democrats to work together to accomplish their goals.

"Tonight, we are all Republicans and Democrats, but tomorrow we are Manhattanites," he said. "It's been a pleasure serving for eight years as your representative and now we need to work together toward the future."

Knopp credited the loss to voter discontent with the Legislature.

"Historically, it is always a tough race for incumbents," Knopp said. "But I think there is a bit of an unfortunate twist here. We had two tough years then, suddenly, the economy improved and people were asking what the Legislature was doing with money in the bank.



"I think there has been a groundswell of discontent with the Legislature," he said. "What happened over those two years forced us to put money away. Then the economy turned around and we were caught. They'll have $300 million in the bank and a lot of things on which to spend it. In retrospect, it's looking like we should have taken some risks and spent some more money."

Sheila Hochhauser shouts her excitement after learning she had won the 67th District race at the Democratic party headquarters in the Cotton Club Tuesday night.

State Representative Dist. 67

One of Hochhauser's main priorities will be to investigate what can be done to improve the census procedure.

"I would like to see if there is anything we can do to make this census procedure more beneficial to Riley County," she said.

The first thing she intends to do when she gets to Topeka is to study Robert's Rules of Order so that she can really understand how the system works, Hochhauser said.

Knopp's wife Nancy said they made some tactical campaign mistakes, pointing at her husband when asked who his campaign manager was.

"You're looking at him," she said, as the election returns came in. The tide had already turned toward Hochhauser.

"It has been really tough," she said. "Hochhauser has waged a very thorough campaign. It's always easier when you're on the outside to look in and say what should have been done."

Knopp, who ran unopposed in the last election, said voters believe that as the House majority leader, he is directly responsible for all legislation.

Kansans enjoy Bush's victory with early party

U.S. Representative

By Audra Dietz
Staff Writer

Kansas Republicans opened champagne and celebrated an early victory at 8:30 Tuesday night when CBS declared George Bush as the next president of the United States.

By 9:15 p.m., Bush had 287 electoral votes and Massachusetts Gov. Michael Dukakis had 85, and happy Republicans started to throw confetti. Chairman of the Kansas Republican Party, Fred Logan, took the podium, and told supporters at the Topeka Ramada Inn that Republicans would be in the White House for another term.

"The most impressive thing about Bush's campaign was the use of local Kansans," he said.

Party Vice Chairman John Petersen said he was glad the election was called early and praised the Bush campaign.

"I was surpised it ended so early, but Bush's campaign was effective," he said.

Last minute rallies in the South, and in the Rocky Mountain Region gave Bush the edge over Dukakis, Petersen said.

"I'm also amazed at how Kansans were able to switch gears and still support Bush after Dole dropped out of the race," he said.

Republican Phil Meinhardt, candidate for the 2nd District U.S. House of Representatives was defeated by incumbent Democrat Jim Slattery.

Poor organization and a lack of money plagued the campaign, Meinhardt said.

"If I had to do it all over, I wouldn't spend any money in the primary. I'd put it all into the general election," he said.

Meinhardt spent $85,000 on his campaign and said he needed at leat four times that amount to compete with Slattery.

Meinhardt said he needed more support from the K-State Young Republicans Club.

"They didn't really come in until the end of the campaign." The Young Republicans at the Universtiy of Kansas were more organized, he said.

Meinhardt said he was surprised the presidential election was called so early, and said he thought the popular vote would be closer.

Republican Jim Case saved one seat for the party by winning the race for the the 57th District in Congress.

"We're a conservative district and that is how I campaigned and that's why I won," he said.

Case said Bush's early victory didn't surprise him, but he thought the media called the race too early.

"This system (the media coverage) needs to change. They didn't need to declare Bush the winner so early," Case said.

Democrat Sheila Hochhauser took credit for the biggest upset in the Kansas Legislature by defeating incumbent Joe Knopp in the 67th District.

Knopp had served four terms and was the House majority leader.

Members of K-State's Young Republican Club were out in full force to celebrate the Bush victory.

Ed Franken, treasurer and senior in engineering, said this year's race was anti-climactic.

"The only question this year was to see if Bush was really going to win. Republicans didn't come out tonight to see if they would get control of the House or Senate, they knew there was no way they could do it," Franken said.

Members of the KU Republican Club also attended.

"I'm also amazed at how Kansans were able to switch gears and still support Bush after Dole dropped out of the race."
—John Petersen
Republican vice chairman

"I came to watch Bush win and console Meinhardt," said John Whitmer, KU sophomore in political science and history.

"I did not think Bush would be declared the winner so early. I thought it would be a closer race, " said Thomas Lane, a KU sophomore in hydro-meteorology.

Petersen said college Republicans helped the GOP ticket.

"Support from K-State, KU and Washburn gave Bush a strong hold in Kansas," he said.

"I knew Bush would win big," said Robert Buckly, a Washburn sophomore in history.

Republicans continued to party as Bush's lead increased, but supporters came for other reasons than to celebrate.

"I came to show the state that KSU's Young Republicans are a valuable organization on campus," said Ray Hammond, K-State senior in agricultural economics and member of the Young Republicans. K-State's chapter brought about 20 members to the campaign headquarters Tuesday night.

The celebration ended at about 10:30 p.m., when party members called it a night.

Voter turnout high for Riley County

By Brian Hummell
Staff Writer

The expected high voter turnout in Riley County came near the projected estimate in Tuesday's general election.

"I had predicted an 80 percent turnout and 79 percent voted. I'm just sorry 100 percent didn't turn out," said Ilene Colbert, county clerk.

Colbert had reason to be happy herself, as she was re-elected to her office. Colbert was one of four county candidates who ran unopposed. She received 13,739 votes.

Other candidates who ran unopposed were John Sjo, who won the District II County Commission seat and received 3,491 votes, County Treasurer Eileen King, who received 13,834 votes and Register of Deeds Charlotte Shawver, who received 13,226 votes. All unopposed candidates are Republicans.

"I'd like to continue the good service we've been giving to the county and continue to provide the great record-keeping we've provided in the past," Shawver said.

"It's a little bit anticlimatic from four years ago, but it still feels good," King said. "We just want to keep computerizing the system and keep progressing. That way we can provide better service for all the taxpayers."

The race for the 3rd District County Commission seat was the closest of the county races. Republican Richard Jepsen received 3,018 votes to Democrat Leslie Frazier's 2,745.

In the county attorney's race Democrat Bill Kennedy defeated Republican John Taylor 9,684 to

Democrats on top in Kansas races

By Erwin Seba
Senior Staff Writer

TOPEKA - Kansas Democrats gathered in a hotel ballroom of the Jayhawk Towers here Tuesday to watch election returns and hear from state party leaders and candidates.

Forming semi-circles around television sets in the room decorated with posters from various campaigns, Democrats cheered as results from across the state showed party candidates leading in the early vote tallies.

They stopped watching television to gather in one big semi-circle around a podium and cheer candidates from Shawnee County and northeast Kansas who gave victory addresses and concession statements.

The loudest cheering and applause for an early winner from the area went to Rep. Jim Slattery, D-2nd District, who, as of 9 p.m., had developed an impressive lead over Republican rival Phil Meinhardt.

"The American people may be about to elect a Republican president, but they are going to elect more Democrats to the Congress," Slattery said in his victory address.

"They want balance," he said.

A similar pattern was taking place across the state, Slattery said.

"Here in Kansas, what's going on is we're electing more Democrats to help balance what's going on across the street in the State Capitol," he said.

During an interview following his speech, Slattery would not comment on his plans to run for a statewide office. He said he was grateful for the statments of support he has received for a possible race for governor in 1992.

But, Slattery said if he is going to mount such a campaign, he must concentrate on his work as a U.S. representative.

"The best thing I can do in the long range is do the best I can in the short range," he said.

When the new president sends his first budget to Congress is when the balance between the two branches will come into play, Slattery said.

"That's when the campaign rhetoric will take a cold bath in reality," he said.

At about 10 p.m, state Rep. Kathleen Sebelius, D-Topeka, announced that Democrat Sheila Hochhauser had defeated House Majority Leader Joe Knopp, R-Manhattan.

"Part of that has to do with dissatisfaction with what the Republican leadership is doing in the state," Sebelius said.

State Democratic Chairman Jim Parrish qualified Sebelius' announcement by saying it "appeared" Hochhauser had defeated Knopp.

He also said it appeared Katha Hurt had defeated state Rep. Ivan Sand, R-Riley.

Tim Phelps, volunteer staff member with the Democratic State Committee, received tallies from House races across the states over the phone.

Phelps worked out of the state party headquarters three floors above the ballroom throughout the

Hurt sweeps incumbent Sand from House seat

By Michael Nichols
Government Editor

"It won't Hurt to sweep Sand out of the House," read a banner in Katha Hurt's reception room at the Cotton Club in downtown Manhattan. And sweep Sand she did.

With an unofficial victory of 1,416 votes over Republican opponent Ivan Sand, Hurt won the election for state representative to the 66th District.

"I'm feeling fine," Hurt said. "I'm excited but it's not a tense kind of excitement."

She seemed surprised she was leading Sand throughout most of the evening.

"I ran two years ago and lost," she said. "I expected it to be a lot closer."

William Denholm, Manhattan developer and Sand supporter, said Hurt won because of the retirement raise state representatives granted themselves in the last term.

"I think that the 44 percent increase the representatives gave themselves for their retirement really hurt them. They kind of went off on their own on that one. And Hurt really played it up."

Byron Whetstone, president of the Riley County Young Republicans, said "without a question, the retirement raise really played a factor in Ivan's case."

Another Sand supporter who didn't want to be named said, "They tacked that increase onto another bill so it was kind of forced through. It ended up cutting into the Kansas Public Employees Retirement Benefit funds and Hurt took advantage of it."

Hurt, however, had definite plans for her upcoming term.

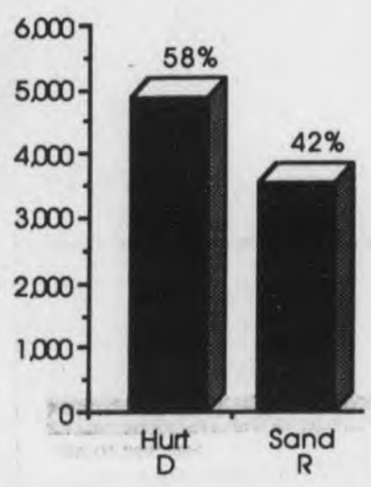
"My major goal is to sleep all of tomorrow," she joked, but added, "I want to represent the people, education in the state, programs that deal with people, and keeping people out of pensions and the welfare cycle."

Hurt said she planned to work for the benefit of her constituents.

"My thrust will be the people," she said.

As far as K-State is concerned, Hurt said she would work to improve the quality of education at the University.

"There is nothing I can do alone in the Legislature," she said. "I will work for the funding of the Margin of Excellence plan, which will bring education at K-State up to average. However, I will not be satisfied with average," she said.



As far as the outcome of the national elections, Hurt said she didn't think either candidate was very different.

"I think Bush will be the same as Reagan," she said. "If either Dukakis or Bush come in, they'll be a one-term president. It will be only four years from now that we will see a real difference."

Lana Oleen, senator-elect of the state's 22nd District, shows her emotion at the Republican candidate headquarters after winning her race for the seat Tuesday night. Oleen won with 52 percent of the vote.

Oleen wins seat

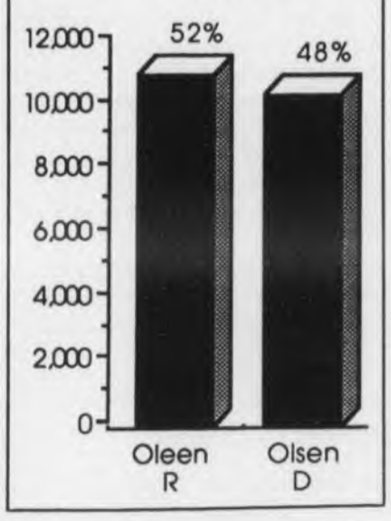
By Brian Hummell
Staff Writer

Lana Oleen's victory Tuesday in the race for the vacant state Senate seat in Kansas' 22nd District proved to be one of the few bright spots for state Republicans.

"This was a tremendous learning experience and a wonderful time for my family and friends," Oleen said. "It's a tremendous responsibility ahead, but I'm ready to tackle it."

Oleen garnered 10,760 or 52 percent of the vote, while her challenger Rod Olsen had 10,120 or 48 percent.

With the loss of two incumbent Republican seats in the Kansas House of Representatives, Oleen's victory was the biggest reason for celebration at the Republican headquarters. House Majority Leader Joe Knopp and Rep. Ivan Sand both lost their re-election bids.



"Ivan Sand and Joe Knopp were tremendous forces and tremendous spokesmen for the state of Kansas, and quite frankly it disappoints me," Oleen said.

Kent Glasscock, Riley County chairman for Oleen's campaign said Oleen's bid for the Senate was important for the district and the state of Kansas.

"Lana ran a positive, clean and

"The perception is that I control everything," he said. "What's been difficult about that is that I'm not held accountable for the good things that happen, but I am the bad."

Knopp said the election of freshman Democrats and ousting of Republicans across the state, could have repercussions on the term of Gov. Mike Hayden.

"This could have a sobering impact on the term of the governor. It comforms with some of the things we've been telling him about the state of the Legislature and it indicates that there could be some serious work ahead in the race two years down the road."

Knopp said no single issue ruined his bid. Rather, Hochhauser's "aggressive campaign" and his security led to his downfall.

"I think I made my mistake in thinking that people understood the political system and the difficulty of making hard decisions," he said. "Perhaps I overestimated the level of understanding of the voters — I'm not saying they are dumb, I'm just saying we overestimated them."

Knopp said he was not looking forward to any other political race, but plans to return to his law practice.

"I'm a lawyer," he said. "I'm going to practice law.

"Politics has always been viewed by me as a strong advocation, not a vocation," he said.

Hochhauser, on the other hand, was excited about her victory.

"I always started out saying, 'I'm Sheila Hochhauser and I'm running for representative of the 67th District.' Now I can say, "I'm Sheila Hochhauser and I am the representative for the 67th District,'" she said.

"We're kicking ass in the House," Phelps said. "Especially out in Manhattan. The Democrats are taking it over."

He said it was hard to predict trends in the House races, but he did venture an opinion.

"It's a little early to predict, but it looks like (State Republican Committee Chairman) Fred Logan's prediction about the House and Senate is coming true," Phelps said.

The House seats occupied by Sand and Knopp traditionally have been Democratic, he said. But, Phelps added, Sand and Knopp have been able to hold on to their seats during the past few years.

"We didn't expect to win those two in Manhattan," he said. "Those two women did a hell of a job getting the vote out."

Phelps did not know the progress of Senate races across Kansas.

"Another guy was doing that. I don't know where he is. He got up and walked out."

Phelps made a phone call and then said if Manhattan Democrat Rod Olsen could defeat Republican opponent Lana Oleen, and if three other Democrats win in three other races as they are expected to, the party would pick up four seats in the state Senate.

"It's hard to think of a lot at a time like this. It's amazing what a bunch of people working together can do.

"My wife stuck with me ... every time I got tired or dejected, someone picked me up and helped me up," he said.

Kennedy said his record as county attorney definitely proved itself.

"The campaign was a challenge on my record," Kennedy said.

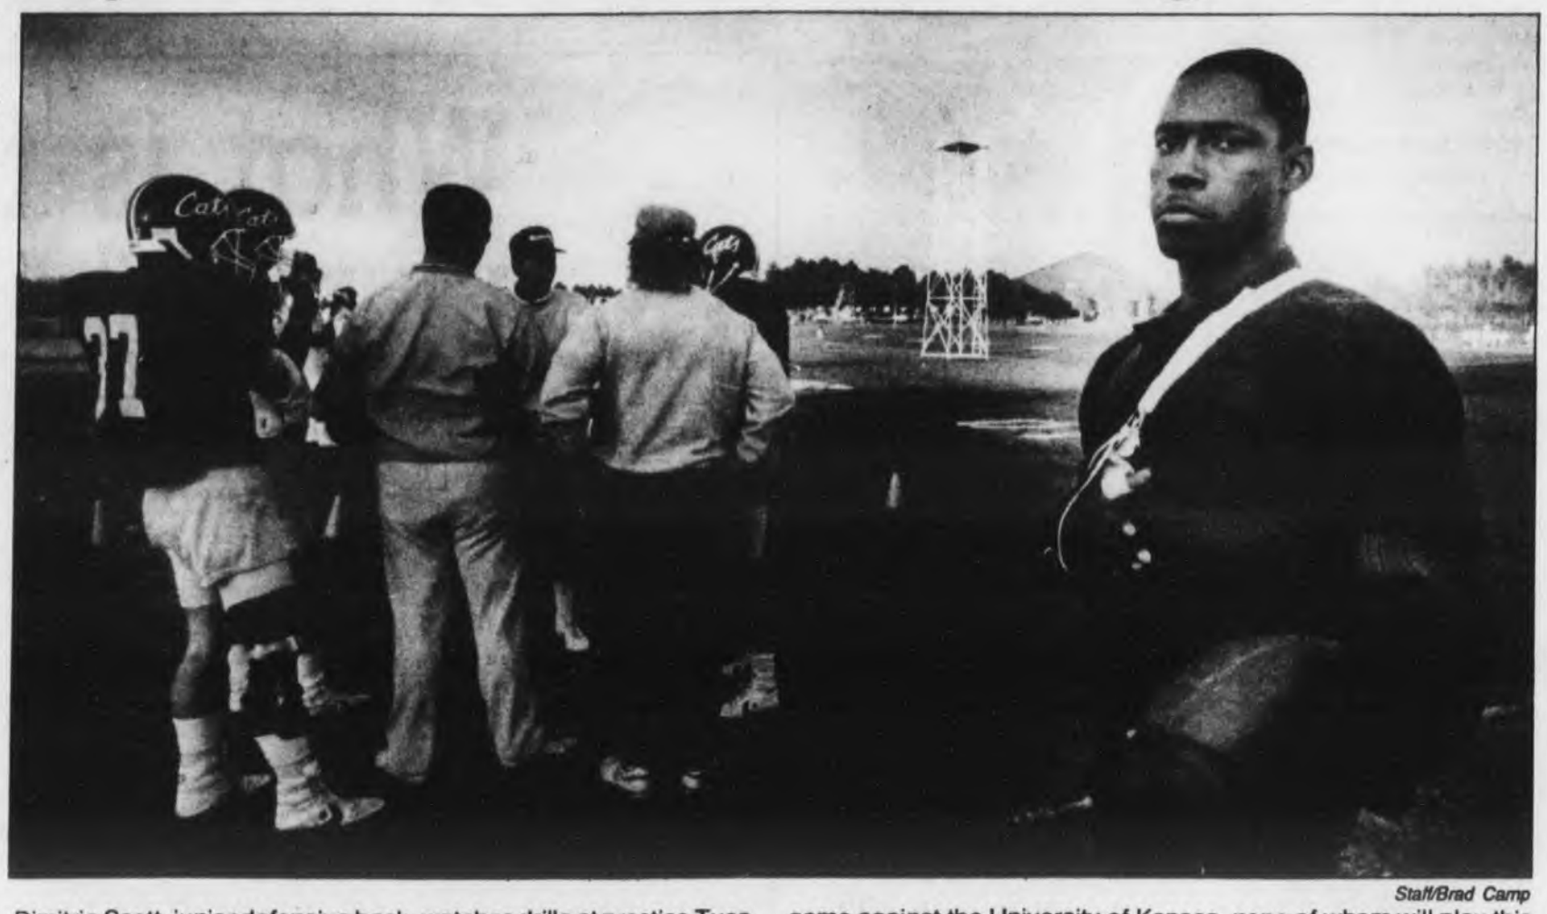
'Cats try to overcome injuries

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

With only two games left in the 1988 season, the Wildcat football team is trying to overcome a barrage of injuries.

In the 'Cats' last game, a 30-12 loss to Kansas, four Wildcat starters left the game with injuries.



All of the players injured in the game will miss the 'Cats' next game against Iowa State Saturday at KSU Stadium, and it is questionable whether three of the players will be in shape for the season finale at Colorado, said Marcia Roschke, football trainer.

"The KU game was pretty tough on this squad," said Roschke. "Some of the injuries can be attributed directly to playing on the (artificial) turf and the others were the result of hard tackles.

"We suffered two shoulder subluxations, which were the result of tackles," she said. "This is when the shoulder slips out of place and then immediately slips back in. Alan Smith suffered a cruciate ligament (injury) in his knee which will require surgery, and is probably out for the rest of the season, and Mark Young severely stretched an ankle ligament."

The number of players hurt in the game, plus those previously injured, has head coach Stan Parrish concerned.

"We were never very deep to begin with," said Parrish. "The injuries probably hurt us more than they would another team with more depth. When we get two or more players at the same position injured it really kills us."

Staff/Brad Camp

Dimitrie Scott, junior defensive back, watches drills at practice Tuesday afternoon. Scott was one of four K-State players injured in the game against the University of Kansas, none of whom will play this weekend against Iowa State.

"It's really hard to put your finger on the reason that we are experiencing so many injuries lately," he said. "Early in the season we rotated a lot of people in the games to keep us fresh and that seemed to help keep our injuries down but we are running out of bodies."

Prior to the KU game, the list of players that were sidelined for the season included four other starters, including a quarterback, a defensive noseguard, a wide receiver and a tight end.

■ Rob Goode: senior noseguard, neck injury, out for the season

■ Russ Campbell: freshman tight end, knee injury, out for the season

■ David Brooks: freshman wide receiver, knee injury, out for the season

■ Gary Swim: senior quarterback, toe injury, out for the season

■ Paul Watson: senior quarterback, shoulder injury, out for the season

■ Doug Blackbourne: senior defensive tackle, shoulder injury, out this week/questionable next week

■ Antoine Dulan: freshman tailback, groin injury, questionable this week

■ Dimitrie Scott: junior defensive end, shoulder injury, out this week/questionable next week

■ Alan Smith: senior defensive tackle, knee injury, out for the season

■ Mark Young: senior noseguard, ankle injury, out this week/probable for the finale

Basketball team to play exhibition

By Chris Wilhelm
Sports Writer

The K-State men's basketball team will get its first test of the 1988 season against a team of ex-college and pro players at 7 p.m. tonight, as the Athletes in Action basketball team comes to the Bramlage Coliseum.

"I think it will be good for our players to play against a group like Athletes in Action," said Wildcat Coach Lon Kruger. "They are a tough bunch of ex-college players and players recently released from National Basketball Association teams. They have already played seven or eight games against college teams this season so they will be a more experienced group than we are."

Kruger is hoping that the experience his team will gain from the match-up will help his players in developing both their on-court abilities as well as their pre-game preparations as the regular season approaches.

"It's important that our players get a chance to simulate their game day routine," Kruger said. "I also think it will help our younger players to get a chance to see what it's like to play in front of people.

"At this point it is more important that our team works on the things that we need to improve on. We haven't really focused on this game as far as preparing for this specific team. We are just continuing to work on our fundamentals."

While Kruger hopes his team will have success against the more experienced players on the Athletes in Action squad, the score won't dictate the type of things his team will do.

"We appreciate the opportunity to play in games like these because they give us a chance to reinforce those things that we need to work on," said Kruger. "It will give us a chance to gauge our conditioning and some of the other things that we have been working on in our early season drills.

"It gives us a chance to play some players and see how they will react in a game situation. While we view this as a game, no matter what the score is, we will probably show a lot of different player combinations and do a lot of different things.

"We will try to get some playing experience for those players that we know we will be calling on during the season to contribute a great deal."

Starters for the 'Cats will include Fred McCoy, Tony Massop, Mark Dobbins or Billy Ray Smith, Steve Henson and LaKeith Humphrey or Todd Stanfield.

It's time for KU fans to quit complaining

Mid-Week Commentary

TOM PERRIN
Sports Columnist

It was Weep-O-Rama time in Lawrence last week with the horrifying news about the University of Kansas basketball team being put on probation by the NCAA.

So supposedly heinous were the Jayhawks' violations, that KU was nearly given the dreaded "death penalty." What's funny, at least to K-State types and assorted other 'Hawk haters, is that the player who got KU in trouble, guard Vincent Askew, never played a game in Allen Fieldhouse and spent only limited time in Lawrence three summers ago.

"Let the fat lady sing across the nation!!! The Kansas Jayhawks on probation?!!!," the T-shirts read. Talk about a novelty marketing bonanza.

What I can't figure out is why all the KU fans are complaining so much, painting former coach Larry Brown, now making megabucks with the NBA San Antonio Spurs, as the villainous man in black.

"He betrayed us and then left us buried in the mud," they said.

But was Larry such a horrible guy for the Jayhawk basketball program? From what I could see, KU got the best of the bargain with the itinerant Brown. Hey, he stayed in Lawrence five years. That's a lot longer than he hung around with the New Jersey Nets, UCLA or the Denver Nuggets.

It may be easy to forget, but before Brown rode in on his then white horse, the tradition-laden KU program was way down in the dumps. Former Coach Ted Owens was about as popular among KU fans as George Bush would be if he showed up at an American Civil Liberties Association fundraiser.

In his first season, Brown took a talent-poor team to the Big Eight tournament title and an NCAA tournament berth. Back then, the guy was a near-saint.

Now, if there was another smart novelty marketer out there somewhere, he would mass-produce Larry Brown dart boards and sell them outside Allen Fieldhouse before KU's season opener.

From what I could see, KU fans got a fair trade-off. Five years of Brown, five years of Ed Manning, four years of Danny Manning, five NCAA tournament trips, two Final Fours and a national title in exchange for one year of probation.

The overall damage to the KU program from the probation should be minimal. Sure, no NCAA tournament this year, but the 'Hawks were looking iffy for that anyway. The loss of a scholarship will hurt, but not much. What's one player? A lot if it's a Danny Manning or Mitch Richmond, but not much otherwise.

The one real penalty is KU's loss of being able to pay for recruits to visit the campus for one year beginning Jan. 1. This will force KU to recruit far more heavily within a relatively close radius of Lawrence. New Jayhawk Coach Roy Williams can practically forget about bringing in the high-profile players from the East and West coasts until 1990.

So, Williams will probably end up recruiting the heck out of Kansas junior colleges, which traditionally produces many of the best transfers in the nation. If Williams is successful at this, KU should be pretty darned good.

In other words, KU is down due to the probation, but the count for the Jayhawks will probably never reach 10.

No firm guarantees, but Leonard says he may fight again

By The Associated Press

LAS VEGAS — Sugar Ray Leonard, clearly satisfied with his latest performance, talked Tuesday about being around for a while longer.

"One thing I can assure you guys is that I'm not retiring," he said. "A guy who doesn't have it any more couldn't have beaten Donny Lalonde."

Of course, that assurance from the fighter who has retired three times is not a guarantee he will fight again.

"Right now I just want go home and relax and watch the tape of the fight and evaluate myself," Leonard, 32, said at a news conference the morning after he knocked down Lalonde twice and stopped him in the ninth round.

The victory for Leonard, who was knocked down in the fourth round, made him the World Boxing Council super middleweight and light heavyweight champion and the first man to win at least pieces of titles in five weight classes.

"If there's anything that gets me started, it's going against the odds," Leonard said.

There are fights for Leonard, but there don't seem to be any challenges.

One fight that is often mentioned is a rematch with Tommy Hearns, who Leonard stopped in the 14th round for the undisputed welterweight title in 1981. Hearns is the only other man to hold at least four world titles.

Hearns was knocked out in the third round by Iran Barkley last June 6 in defense of the WBC middleweight title and was almost knocked out by James Kinchen last Friday night, although he rallied to win a 12-round decision.

Leonard said he went into Monday night's fight at the Las Vegas Hilton with a premonition.

"I had this feeling I would be knocked down," he said.

When it happened, Leonard said he thought, "Great, that's out of the way. Now it's time for the next script, the next chapter."

Leonard was hurt in the ninth round when he landed a right to the jaw that turned the fight.

Of the second knockdown — referee Richard Steele didn't even bother to count — Lalonde said, "I never felt the punch. I woke up on the canvas and said, 'Hey Dave (manager Dave Wolfe) let's keep fighting.' He said, 'Hey, it's over.'

"You can only measure yourself by what you face. Last night, I faced a great fighter."

Cyclone coach says loss to 'Cats 'would take us right into the tank'

By The Associated Press

AMES, Iowa — Iowa State Coach Jim Walden would hate to see a satisfying season go down the drain this weekend.

The Cyclones play at winless K-State on Saturday and are 16-point favorites to square their record at 5-5. Walden said Tuesday his team has exceeded all expectations this season, and it would be disastrous to lose to the Wildcats, who have gone 25 straight games without a victory.

"There are consequences if we let an 0-9 team beat us," he said at his weekly session with reporters. "It would undo all the good things we've accomplished this fall. It would take us right into the tank."

K-State is coming off a 30-12 loss to Kansas and hasn't won since beating Kansas 29-12 late in the 1986 season. The only non-loss since then was a 7-7 tie with Kansas last fall.

Thus, the game should offer a respite for the Cyclones, who were hammered by Nebraska 51-16 last Saturday. But Walden warned that his players still have to take it seriously.

"It's more important than it is big," he said. "We have a chance to be .500 after 10 games. Not many thought we could be in that position. I would have been one of them three months ago."

Walden said the only poor game the Cyclones have played this year was a 35-0 loss to Baylor back on Sept. 17. He said the coaching staff deserves much of the blame for that lackluster performance because the Cyclones weren't prepared to handle Baylor's defense.

On the plus side, Iowa State avenged a 1987 loss to Tulane, reversed a trend of lopsided losses to Iowa (losing only 10-3), upset Missouri 21-3 and put up a good fight in losing to Oklahoma (35-7) and Colorado (24-12).

"I am real happy with them," Walden said. "I am excited what these guys have done. They've made it a fun year. I'm kind of sorry to see it all come to an end.

"It's been fun going to practice, they had a cheery attitude, they haven't played many down minutes. That's a quality of this team."

Iowa State concludes the season with a home game against Oklahoma State on Nov. 19, so a 5-6 final record is likely.

While he insists he doesn't lose any sleep stewing about it, Walden said he thinks the Cyclones would have a good chance to win if they played either Iowa, Baylor or Colorado again.

Turning one of those games around would have left Iowa State in an excellent position to achieve a winning season.

"To come out of this with a winning season would have been absolutely phenomenal," he said. "I would have personally enjoyed beating Iowa more than the other two for selfish reasons because of the competition."

Canseco takes Player of the Year

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Jose Canseco, the first major leaguer to hit 40 homers and steal 40 bases in one season, was selected The Associated Press Player of the Year on Tuesday.

The Oakland right fielder received 141½ votes from a panel of sportswriters and broadcasters. Los Angeles right-hander Orel Hershiser was runner-up with 13 votes followed by Minnesota's Kirby Puckett with five votes and Boston's Mike Greenwell with 4½.

"It means a lot because it shows the improvement I've made between 1986 and 1988," said Canseco, who was married earlier this month.

Not that 1986 and '87 were all that bad.

Canseco hit .240 in 1986 with 33 homers and 117 runs batted in en route to the American League Rookie of the Year award. In 1987, he had 31 homers and 113 RBI.

This season, it all came together as Canseco led the majors with 42 homers and 124 RBI while hitting .307.

The American League charts 17 different offensive categories and Canseco ranked in the top 10 in 12 of them.

"I don't think I had a bad drought except for an 0-for-20. And even when I was 0-for-20, I was hitting the ball well, so the key was staying consistent," said Canseco, who led the Athletics to their first AL pennant since 1974.

Canseco has homered more times in his first three full seasons (106) than anyone but Eddie Mathews (112) and Joe DiMaggio (107).

His 111 career homers, including five after a late-season callup in 1985, are the 10th-highest total for a player at the end of the year in which he turned 24. The other nine players are in the Hall of Fame.

Mel Ott, who already played eight seasons, had 176 at Canseco's age. All-time leader Henry Aaron had 140 en route to his record 755.

On Aug. 6, Canseco stole his 30th base to become the 11th player to reach the 30-30 club, joining such all-time greats as Mays and Aaron. On Sept. 23, Canseco took his place in baseball history when he stole his 40th base.

minority affairs.

"In all of my leadership positions on campus, I have tried to facilitate communication of ideas between minority organizations and majority organizations," he said.

Cuffy said he would like to change the way students perceive student government.

"I'd like to give SGA a new image," Cuffy said. "Not too many students frequent SGA (meetings). I'd like to have SGA be a place where students of different backgrounds can come and work on different projects that the senators can help them with," he said.

"This would make SGA less threatening, make it seem less elite," he said.

Cuffy said he believes a student body president's major concern is the representation of the students.

"I'd like to increase representation of under-represented groups," he said. "This will take the cooperation of the leaders of our university.

"The student body president must express and reflect the best of the student body so when he speaks to Wefald or the regents he can show that he's a diverse leader with diverse concerns," Cuffy said.

"I'm approachable," he said. "I sincerely want to reach students to get the input to resolve issues, but more importantly to let them see what they can be which is a person who can benefit from relationships with a variety of people."

tem," he said.

McIntyre has a two-fold plan, on the campus and state levels, for gaining funding for Farrell Library.

"The first step involves gathering information on other university libraries and dealing with the administration and library staff to find out what they need to get closer to their peers.

"Also, it includes disseminating information and educating students, who have to lead the way in making (funding for Farrell) a priority, like we did with the Margin of Excellence," McIntyre said.

Taking requests to the Board of Regents and the Legislature would be the next step, he said.

"There are monies available. We can't back down from the library.

"It's kind of a pet project of mine. Whether or not I get elected, I'll be involved," he said.

This campaign has been a learning experience for the Plainville native.

"I've learned about concerns and ideas of students that I was never aware of, by going out and talking to people," he said.

up big."

It was the second crash of a B-1B bomber, as the production version of the plane is known. The first, 13 months ago, claimed three lives.

Paulsen, who is an Air Force reserve member, said the pilot apparently abandoned hope of returning to Dyess and decided to ditch the plane in an unpopulated area.

"It banked back toward the left, then they started ejecting," said Paulsen, who was watching with his wife. "Three chutes came out, right after another. Then the plane started veering left into the country.

"The last parachute came out seconds before the plane crashed in a ravine in an unpopulated area," he said.

When it hit, the plane exploded in a fireball 10 stories high. White smoke could be seen for more than 20 miles, filling the sky west of Abilene, witnesses said.

The Air Force ordered 100 of the planes at a total cost of $27 billion.

Stephan

Stephan said he would be represented exclusively by private counsel in any further legal action.

Stephan was represented by Gerald Michaud of Wichita and Assistant Attorney General Carl Gallagher.

"For almost two years I was sued in my official capacity as attorney general," Stephan said. "In those circumstances, it was not only proper, but statutorily required for me to be provided with representation from this office."

Although Stephan was named as a private individual after two years of the suit's progress, he said, "the real characteristics had not changed."

Michaud will no longer be his private counsel, Stephan said, but not because he is dissatisfied with Michaud's conduct of his defense.

"(Michaud) was magnificent. He and Carl Gallagher could not have worked harder," he said.

Stephan did not rule out an appeal of the jury's decision if the court does not modify the jury's award.

Stephan said he did not know where he would find the money to pay the $200,000 in damages if he is eventually required to do so.

"I guess they could garnishee my check every month," he said.

Stephan said he has declined contributions from supporters to pay the damages.

"One individual dropped a check off and I put 'void' on it. That's inappropriate," he said.

Stephan said he has also declined telephone offers of contributions.

exception. The chairman of the House Banking Committee lost his seat to Ronald K. Machtley after 14 terms.

In a closely watched gubernatorial race, 32-year-old Democrat Evan Bayh claimed the Indiana governor's office and ended 20 years of Republican occupancy. Gov. Arch Moore, on-again, off-again Republican governor of West Virginia, was off again — at the hands of Gaston Caperton.

Bush's campaign manager crowed about the Southern fortress erected for the vice president. "He got a clean sweep there on Super Tuesday (in the primary campaign) and he got a clean sweep in the general election," said the South Carolinian.

Bentsen said on ABC that Republicans "did a job on Michael Dukakis with the negative ads .... And they distorted his record, to a remarkable degree."

Democrats were renewing majorities in both the House and Senate that will comprise the 101st Congress. The two parties vied for gains in 12 gubernatorial contests, races that held significance for a nationwide redistricting that takes place after the 1990 census.

Democrats held a 54-46 edge in the old Senate and an overwhelming 255-177 advantage in the old House, with three vacant seats.

Unekis predicts a split government with the democrats controlling the Legislature. This will mean a "continuation of the situation now which is a deadlock — its difficult to address issues (in this situation) like the debt."

"Many people feel a lot of these issues are going to have to be resolved. Somebody is going to have to deal with these issues (debt, etc.). Next four years there is a potential of a continuation of the situation because of split government."

Michael Donnelly, K-State associate professor of English, said "two of the issues, if nothing else that I'd liked to see changed are foreign adventurism, especially in Central America, and the idea of two societies (the rich and poor) that Reagan has been furthering."

Democratic senators winning reelection included Edward Kennedy in Massachusetts; Paul Sarbanes in Maryland; James Sasser of Tennessee; Daniel Patrick Moynihan in New York and Don Riegle in Michigan, Howard Metzenbaum in Ohio, Jeff Bingaman in New Mexico and Quentin Burdick in North Dakota. Frank Lautenberg fought off a spirited challenge from Pete Dawkins to hold his New Jersey seat.

Robert Byrd of West Virginia also won, as did Maine's George Mitchell — one of three men who hope to succeed him as Senate Majority Leader.

Republican senators re-elected were Richard Lugar in Indiana, John Danforth of Missouri, John Heinz of Pennsylvania, William Roth in Delaware, David Durenberger in Minnesota and Orrin Hatch in Utah.

aggressive campaign. She began on a positive note and is ending on the same kind of positive note," Glasscock said.

As Oleen returned to the Republican campaign headquarters, she was met by Sen. Merrill Werts, whose seat she will be taking over in January. The Junction City Republican presented Oleen with a yellow rose and a hug.

"Here's the senator," Oleen said.

"For two more months," Werts said.

Werts is retiring at the end of his present term.

"I think in Lana, K-State will have a strong supporter. She'll be hitting the ground with a running head start — she's acquainted with people on both sides of the aisle," Werts said. "I think she will rapidly move into a leadership position."

Oleen said some of the issues she expects to be brought up in the next session are school finance, prison reform and redistricting and reapportionment.

Olsen said he hopes Oleen will stick to the pledges made during her campaign.

"I hope that she does follow through on her pledge against affiliating Washburn University," he said. "I also hope that with regard to the census, she supports the counting of the military and students (in Riley and Geary Counties)."

Olsen said he won't be running again in the next elections.

Cuffy wins runoff; eligibility contested

By Audra Dietz
and Kendra Gensemer
Staff Writers

Laurian Cuffy rushed into a crowd of about 50 screaming supporters at a friend's house Wednesday night after he was informed by election officials that he won the run-off election for student body president.

"My campaign theme of 'Unity and Growth' is reality right now. This proves that different people can come together to achieve a goal, and that is what we did," Cuffy said under a shower of champagne.

However, it will be a while before K-State students find out for certain who their next president will be.

Although Cuffy tallied 1,186 votes to defeat opponent John McIntyre with 916 votes, McIntyre's staff decided to contest the election based on information from sources that Cuffy had violated campaign rules.

McIntyre said in addition to turning in his expenditure report late, Cuffy had been kicked out of Kramer Food Center and Goodnow Hall for campaigning there.

"Those are blatant violations of the rules," McIntyre said. "I am afraid not only for me but also for the students. How many (rules) is he going to break in the next 12 months?"

McIntyre has until Friday to provide a written report supporting his basis for contesting the election.

Cuffy said he wasn't certain why the election was being contested.

"I am not really sure," he said. "The rumor is that I violated campaign rules. Apparently John (McIntyre) was not satisfied with the elections committee decision to keep my name on the ballot."

Cuffy said he was ordered to leave Kramer Food Center for soliciting votes.

"In Kramer I went to introduce myself to students as Laurian Cuffy and was told I had to stop eating and leave," he said.

Cuffy said a girl started yelling at him and got a hall official to throw him out. Cuffy said Kramer was a strong hold for McIntyre, and that is why he was forced to leave.

McIntyre is a resident of Marlatt Hall and Marlatt residents eat at Kramer.

"The message I got at Kramer was 'this isn't your turf' because Marlatt was McIntyre's area. I also ate at Derby Food Center and I had no trouble at all. Right away that shows you a difference," he said.

Cuffy said eating at the food centers was part of his campaign strategy.

"We had to make up the 400-vote deficit to win the runoff and I couldn't do that without meeting masses of people, so we came up with this meal plan," he said.

McIntyre beat Cuffy in the general election 826 votes to 436, but an energized campaign convinced voters to check Cuffy on the final ballot, said Ira Bolden, Cuffy's campaign manager and junior in electrical engineering.

Cuffy said he ate breakfast at Derby on Nov. 7 and he ate dinner at Kramer on Nov. 8, the night before the runoff. He did not eat at either food center before the general election on Nov. 2 and 3.

Cuffy also said he was told to leave Goodnow Hall for soliciting.

"I went to various places in Goodnow where I know people and I knocked on the wrong door by mistake," he said. "A staff individual told me I had to leave."

McIntyre's staff is basing its claims on Association of Residence Halls Solicitation Policy, Section E, said Mary Jo Lampe, McIntyre's campaign manager and senior in human ecology.

The policy states there will be no door-to-door solicitation in residence halls, Lampe said.

Furthermore, she said that in reference to campus food centers, the policy states that specific permission must be obtained from the Hall Governing Boards of the surrounding halls.

McIntyre said the decision to contest was not a preplanned action.

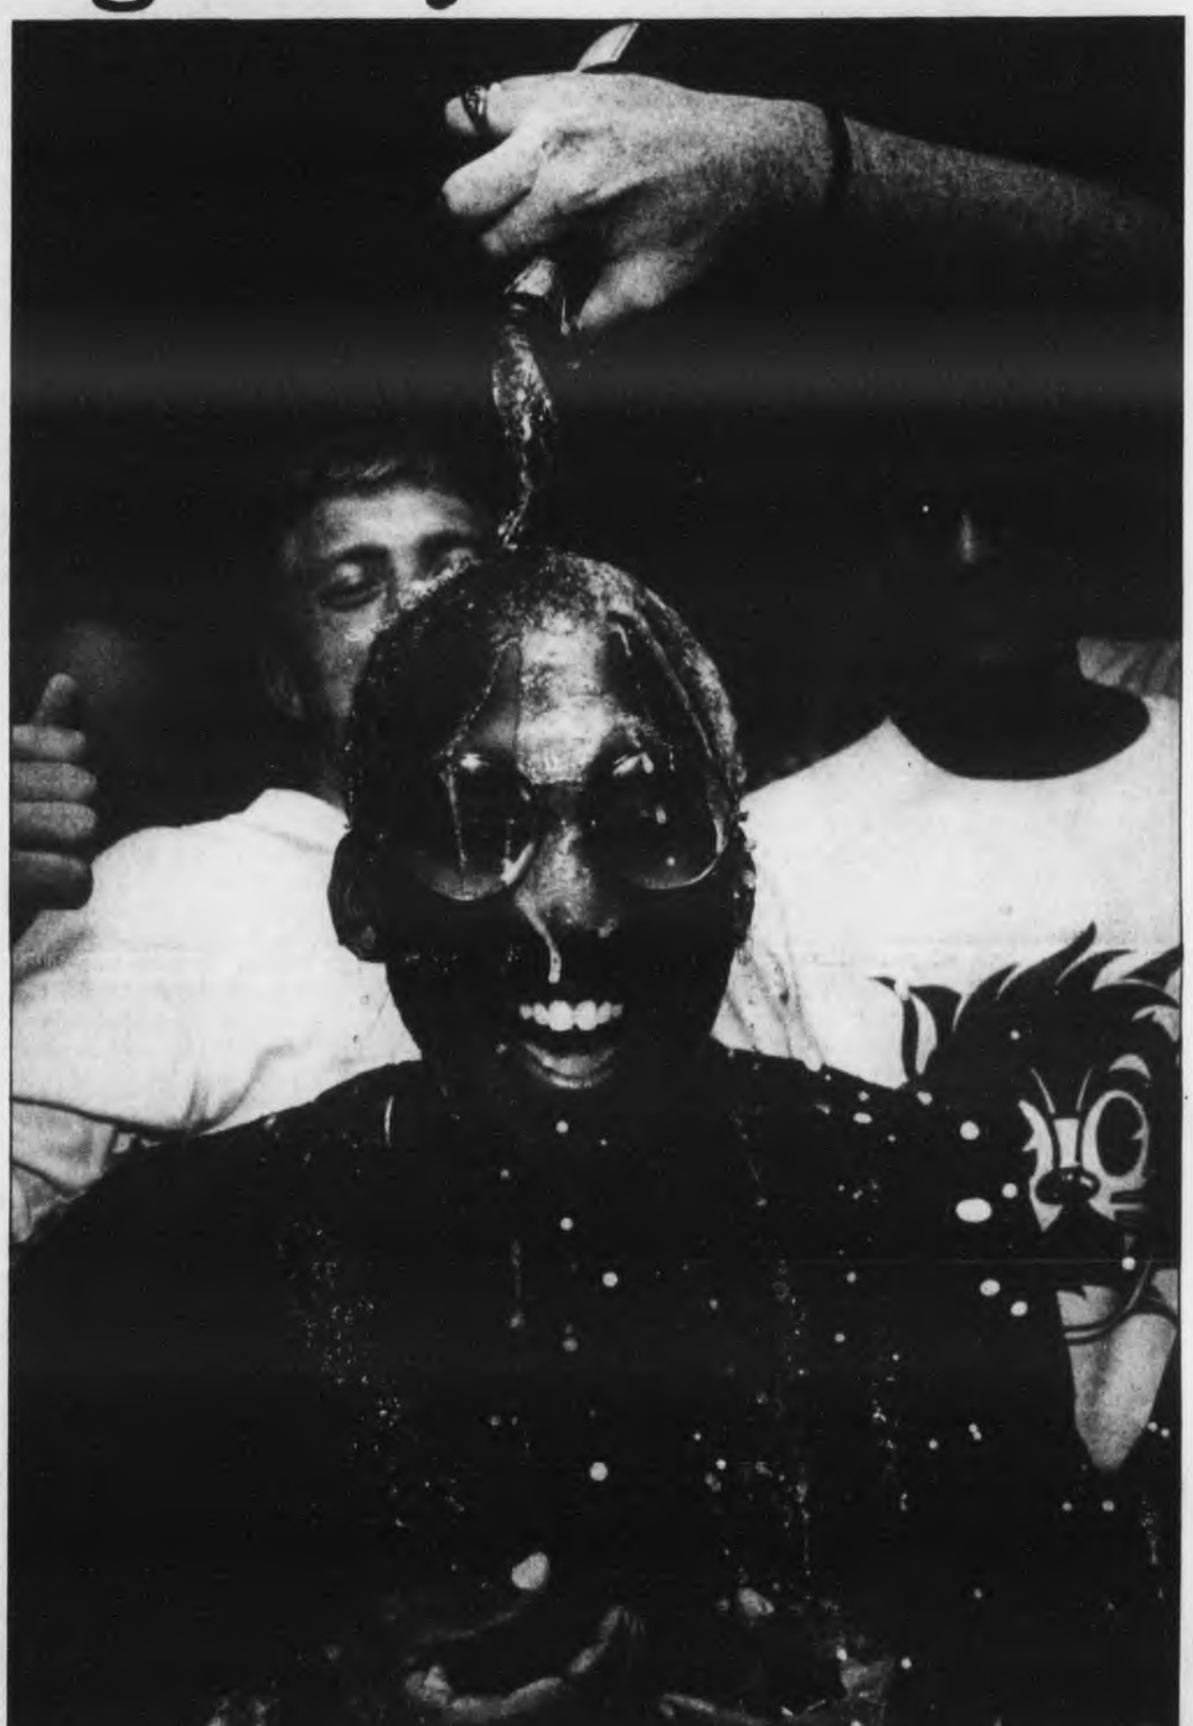
The election committee will determine Monday whether the contest can be based on this policy.

"We won by 200 votes and that says a lot about our support. I can't see how they could possibly negate our success. The voters were behind us," Cuffy said.

Pat Pesci, director of Kramer, said he couldn't verify the accuracy of the information until today.

"We don't have procedures set for this sort of thing," said Sally Routson, coordinator of student activities and student government adviser. "Article 1 of our bylaws isn't very specific."

Routson referred to Art. 1, Sec. 1, a. 2 of the student government bylaws which states: "All complaints concerning an all-campus election shall be reviewed by elections committee and a decision issued. This decision may be appealed to Student Tribunal."



It was an emotional evening for McIntyre. Supporters gathered in the Student body president-elect Laurian Cuffy has champagne poured over his head during a post-election party. Cuffy defeated John McIntyre 1,186 to 916 votes in the run-off election Wednesday.

Baker selected for post

By The Associated Press

HOUSTON — President-elect George Bush picked James A. Baker III, a Reagan administration stalwart, as his secretary of state Wednesday but also pledged a "major turnover" of personnel to reinvigorate the government.

Barely 11 hours after claiming victory, Bush announced a handful of key appointments, headed by the nomination of long-time ally Baker. Outgoing Secretary of State George P. Shultz enthusiastically endorsed the selection.

"He's big shoes to fill," Bush said of Shultz, "but we'll get the job done."

Craig Fuller, Bush's vice presidential chief of staff, and campaign pollster Robert Teeter will share authority as co-chairmen of the transition team that will plan the takeover of power from Reagan.

In a declaration sure to send shudders through the ranks of the 5,000 political appointees happily at work in the Reagan administration, Bush said, "I will for the most part bring in a brand new team of people from across the country.

"And in my view that will reinvigorate the process," Bush said.

However, he carefully left room for some Reagan holdovers and veterans to join his administration. "There will be ... a major turnover but some people at various levels may be asked to remain."

The president-elect said he wanted to announce the rest of his Cabinet "sooner rather than way late" and would think about the possible choices during a Florida vacation this weekend.

It is widely assumed Bush will ask Treasury Secretary Nicholas Brady, Attorney General Dick Thornburgh and Education Secretary Lauro Cavazos to stay on. All three joined the Reagan administration in the past few months.

Thornburgh said Wednesday that he had been given no indication of whether Bush wanted him to remain.

The Washington Post reported that Bush wanted to replace Thornburgh with former Environmental Protection Agency chief William Ruckelshaus or Illinois Gov. James Thompson. Thompson said Wednesday that he wasn't interested.

Former Sen. John Tower of Texas, an arms negotiator in the Reagan administration who later advised Bush's campaign on national security matters, is expected to be in line for secretary of defense.

Ann Dore McLaughlin may keep her post as Labor secretary or get another Cabinet position, possibly Interior, where she was undersecretary from 1984 to 1987.

Others mentioned as possible nominees for the Labor post include Rep. Tom Ridge, R-Pa., and Constance Horner, now director of the Office of Personnel Management.

Former Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole, wife of one-time Bush rival Bob Dole, also is mentioned as a candidate for another Cabinet job.

For the powerful post of budget chief, the odds on favorite is Richard Darman.

Bush has 73 days to fill his Cabinet.

Ambassador to lecture

By Scott Miller
Special Projects Editor

Vernon Walters, the U.S Ambassador to the United Nations, will deliver the 81st Landon Lecture on Public Issues at 10:30 a.m. Friday in McCain Auditorium.

Charles Reagan, chairman of the Landon Lecture Series, said Walters will speak on recent successes of the United Nations.

"General Walters has served in diplomatic roles in a number of administrations, dating back to Truman. I think he is someone who can bring us a perspective on what role the United States plays and ought to play in the United Nations," he said.

Besides serving for more than 40 years in the U.S. Army, Walters' career has included involvement in secret diplomatic initiatives, covert actions and several coups.

Reagan said some of the events in Walters' history "raise legitimate questions."

"I hope someone will ask him about all this. There's no reason why students shouldn't ask General Walters about these events."

In his history of the CIA, "The Man Who Kept the Secrets," Thomas Powers writes of Walters, "He's been the workhorse for so many administrations. They feel free to call on him to do just about anything."

Journalist Claudia Wright wrote in a 1985 article for the New Statesman that Walters had the distinction of being "directly or indirectly ... involved in overthrowing more governments than any other official ... in the U.S. government."

Born in 1917 in New York City, Walters soon moved to Europe with his family. He went to school in France and Britain. It was in Europe that he first showed his talent for learning languages. Walters speaks French, Spanish, Italian, Portuguese, German, Dutch and Russian.

During World War II, Walters' language skills secured him a place in officers' school and an assignment with an intelligence unit. It was the beginning of a career in the U.S. Army which spanned four decades (1941-1976) and included such positions as special aide to President Harry Truman, translator and military attache in several countries.

During this period, Walters gained his first experience with secret missions.

According to a summer 1986 article in "Covert Action" by Ellen Ray and William Schaap, Walters freely acknowledged his involvement in the 1953 coup which ousted the government of Iranian Premier Mohammed Mossadegh and reinstalled the shah.

In 1964, as military attache in Brazil, Walters accurately predicted one week in advance the exact day of a coup which ousted constitutionally elected president Joao Goulart and installed the military government of General Humberto Castelo Branco. On the morning of the coup, Walters breakfasted with Branco, whom he had known since World War II.

According to Ray and Schaap, Walters defended the coup, calling it a revolution.

"A regime basically unfriendly to the United States had been replaced by another one much more friendly. Some may regard this as bad. I do not. I am convinced that if the revolution had not occurred, Brazil would have gone the way of Cuba," Walters said at the time.

Walters was deputy director of the CIA in 1972-76, including one year

Milk cartons hold gold, jewels

GOTEBORG, Sweden — Two carpet layers found 24 milk cartons filled with jewelry and cash in the floor of the home of a deceased goldsmith who had hidden the cache apparently to avoid paying taxes, it was reported Wednesday.

The unidentified man had not revealed the existence of the money and gems to his son and sole heir, who now will inherit it, according to the newspaper Goteborgs Posten.

The workers discovered a trap door in the floor when they were changing carpets. The cartons were packed neatly with necklaces, bracelets, earrings and currency.

Police estimated the cache to be worth at least $160,000.

Before his death, the man had declared in a tax statement that he had no savings, the newspaper said.

Estate inventory proceedings were completed when the find was made, and tax authorities decided not to make any claims on the fortune, the newspaper said.

BRIEFLY ACROSS THE NATION

Planes fly near each other

MARQUETTE, Mich. — An Air Force B-52 bomber and a commuter airplane flew within 150 feet of each other, but authorities said Wednesday the aircraft were not in danger of colliding.

"My heart rate's still up," said Terence Brown, a passenger on Northwest Airlink Flight 2753.

The incident occurred at 3:20 p.m. Tuesday, about 10 minutes before the commuter plane was to land at the Marquette County Airport on a flight from Detroit.

The B-52 was stationed at K.I. Sawyer Air Force Base about 15 miles southeast of the airport, said Sgt. Anita Bailey, a Sawyer spokeswoman.

"Both aircraft were under air traffic control radar and ... both pilots saw each other visually," she said.

Officials with Simmons Airlines, which operates commuter flights under contract with Northwest Airlines, did not believe the planes came close enough to warrant a report, Bailey said.

Justice Dept. official resigns

WASHINGTON — Justice Department official William Bradford Reynolds, who championed the Reagan administration's controversial civil rights policies for more than seven years, announced Wednesday that he is resigning effective Dec. 9.

Reynolds said he probably will remain in the Washington area to practice law and is discussing job possibilities with a number of private firms.

In a letter to Attorney General Dick Thornburgh, Reynolds said that "our uncompromising adherence to the principle of non-discrimination has brought us noticeably closer" to judging people by "the content of their character, not the color of their skin." The latter quote came from the 1963 "I have a dream" speech by slain civil rights leader Martin Luther King Jr.

Reynolds spearheaded the Reagan administration's opposition to affirmative action hiring and promotion programs and other anti-discrimination tools that had been at the heart of federal civil rights policies since the 1960s.

Liberals expressed pleasure over his resignation while conservatives praised his record.

"If Brad Reynolds' departure is an indication of what the Bush Justice Department will look like, then this is a hopeful sign indeed," Arthur Kropp, president of People for the American Way, a civil liberties organization with 270,000 members, said.

Breast implants protested

WASHINGTON — A private health advocacy group asked the Food and Drug Administration on Wednesday to ban the use of silicone gel implants for breast enlargement and other purposes.

Dr. Sidney M. Wolfe, head of Public Citizen Health Research Group, said the FDA should issue an immediate alert warning the public of the possibility of cancer being caused by silicone breast implants.

Wolfe, who co-founded Health Research Group with Ralph Nader, made public a letter he sent FDA Commissioner Frank Young. Wolfe's letter followed in the wake of FDA's announced decision earlier this month to look into safety concerns about breast implants.

The federal agency already has issued a position paper calling attention to the fact that it has scheduled a meeting of its plastic surgery devices advisory panel for Nov. 22 to "review potential health problems that may be caused by silicone breast implants."

The FDA document said the agency "has been increasingly concerned about reports of adverse effects from breast implants, particularly in view of the large number of women who receive them."

The agency said about 130,000 breast implants are being done per year, most for cosmetic purposes.

Former attorney general dies

WASHINGTON — Former Attorney General John Mitchell died Wednesday evening of a heart attack, a hospital spokeswoman said. He was 75.

Claudia Dominitz, a spokeswoman for George Washington University Hospital, said Mitchell died at 6:27 p.m. EST.

Mitchell, who served 19 months in prison during the 1970s in connection with the Watergate scandal of President Richard M. Nixon's administration, had collapsed on a Georgetown sidewalk, and ambulance units found him unconscious but breathing, said an ambulance dispatcher who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Illness misdiagnosed; girl dies

HAVENSVILLE, Kan. — A 5-year-old girl died and four relatives were hospitalized Wednesday after being overcome by carbon monoxide poisoning, hours after they went to a hospital complaining of dizziness and nausea and were diagnosed as having the flu, officials said.

Authorities blamed a clogged flue and vent attached to a woodburning stove for spreading carbon monoxide throughout the house where the victims were found.

Pottawatomie County Investigator Gerald Schmidt said an emergency department doctor at Stormont-Vail Regional Medical Center in Topeka diagnosed the five family members' symptoms as the flu Tuesday night, and they returned home about midnight.

Amanda Crane, 5, of Albion, Mich., was found dead in the house Wednesday morning. Her grandparents, Tom Routh, 44, and Pat Routh, 43, were both hospitalized in critical condition Wednesday — Tom Routh at Stormont-Vail and Pat Routh at St. Francis Hospital and Medical Center.

The girl's sister, Mandy Crane, 2, was hospitalized in fair condition at Stormont-Vail and her mother, Nancy Crane, 24, was hospitalized there in satisfactory condition.

A spokesman at St. Francis said Pat Routh was being treated for carbon monoxide inhalation but authorities at Stormont-Vail would not say what the family members hospitalized there were being treated for.

Students plan political satire

Students for Educational Awareness will present a sketch called "The Last Ditch Redemption of Vernon" at 12:30 p.m. today in the Union Courtyard.

The sketch will be a 15-minute satire on the life of Vernon Walters, Friday's Landon lecturer, said James Hamilton, associate professor of philosophy. Walters, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, has been involved in supporting the right wing overthrow of various democracies.

"Walters has the distinction of being involved in more coups than any other member of the United Nations council," said Hamilton. "We feel that students shoud be made aware of this fact, and the theater is one way to do that."

The sketch will be perfomed again outside McCain Auditorium before Friday's Landon Lecture.

Seat belts decrease chance of personal injury

By Theresa Luling
Collegian Reporter

For many, automobile accidents are the killers of dreams. Every day, Americans risk their future investments by not wearing their seat belts. Their reasons for not buckling up are varied.

Some complain seat belts are uncomfortable. Others fear being trapped during a crash.

"Statistics show that everyone will be in a disabling crash at least once in their lifetime," said Michael Dix, project manager for the safety belt education office in Justin Hall and Extension assistant of human development and family studies.

"Motor vehicle wrecks are the No. 1 cause of death for those under the age of 44. But if people would simply buckle up, they would reduce their chances of serious injury by 65 percent and cut their odds of being killed by more than half," Dix said.

"It is important to note that the use rate is going up in Kansas," said Mike Bradshaw, project director for the safety belt education office.

In 1988, 50.3 percent of the Manhattan residents used seat belts as opposed to 15.7 percent in 1985. In Topeka, 53.2 percent wore seat belts as opposed to 14.1 percent, Bradshaw said.

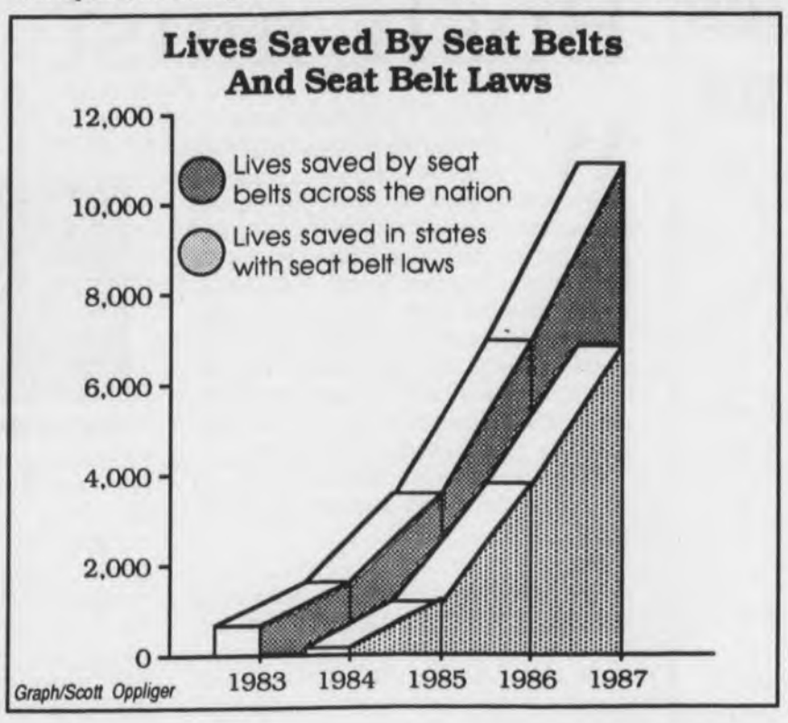
"People are more paranoid now that we have the (seat belt) law," he said.

To date, 32 states and the District of Columbia mandate seat belt use in the front seat.

Eight states enforce a primary law which gives an officer the right to cite an individual for not wearing a safety belt at any time, Bradshaw said. Those states are Hawaii, New Mexico, Texas, Iowa, Minnesota, North Carolina, Connecticut and New York.

The remaining states enforce a secondary seat belt law. This states that an officer must stop the driver for some other traffic violation, such as running a stoplight, before a citation can be given for seat belt misuse, he said.

"Many people believe the seat belt law would be easier to enforce if the primary law was issued in all states," Dix said.



When two cars collide, there are two collisions, Bradshaw said.

"When one car hits another car or object, this is the first collision," he said. "The second collision occurs when unbelted occupants are thrown into the car's windshield, steering wheel, doors, dashboard or other hard interior surfaces."

Through the continuous study of automobile accidents, experts have found it is usually the second collision that injures and kills people, Bradshaw said.

Once the second collision has taken place, the damage is done — or so experts thought. But now they are looking at the possibility of a third collision.

"(The third collision) occurs when the internal organ movement is stopped by the skeletal system," Bradshaw said. "For example, there is the possibility the brain could be damaged when it hits the skull."

Many people believe seat belts are the best way to ensure passengers' safety.

"Lap-and-shoulder seat belts are the most effective safety precaution motorists can take to prevent injury," Dix said.

While buckling up may be instinctive for some front-seat riders, it's often forgotten by passengers in the back.

According to an article in Reader's Digest, only five states — California, Montana, Nevada, Washington and Wisconsin — require back-seat riders to buckle up.

This problem uncovers the fact that children between the ages of four and 13 do not fall under any safety belt laws in Kansas, Dix said.

"Parents who let their children move around are leaving them vulnerable to injuries that need not be suffered," he said.

A child safety law in Kansas was passed in 1982 and revised in 1984. The law required children under four to be properly buckled into a child car safety seat when riding with a parent or guardian in the front seat of a car.

In the past few years, the number of fatalities has not increased dramatically, Dix said. But the 65 mph speed limit, the decreasing gas prices and the increased number of drivers on the road have changed driving habits.

"Once drivers get off the interstate and onto the country roads, they continue to speed," he said. "Many times exceeding the speed limit by five to 10 mph."

Dix said some of the changes were due to more of the younger population frequenting the roads.

"A large percentage of drivers are between the ages of 14 and 18 years," he said. "They are inexperienced and it is shown that they have two times the number of accidents on the road."

Insurance companies have begun to promote the use of seat belts by offering special discounts to policy holders.

"This is occurring with a number of businesses," said Kashca Henry, employee for Town and Country Insurance. "One of our major companies is offering a discount if the car has an automatic passive restraint system."

"It is estimated that society incurs almost $50 million (in damages) a year in traffic accidents," Dix said.

Bombers grounded for testing; inspection 'normal precaution'

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Air Force on Wednesday grounded the nation's fleet of B-1B long-range bombers for a precautionary safety inspection following a crash of one of the new planes in Texas.

The Strategic Air Command, which is responsible for land-based nuclear bomber and missile forces, said the order to suspend flying was a "normal precaution" in the wake of a major accident.

The flight suspension order will be followed within the next day or two by specific instructions to B-1B mechanics on what aircraft systems they must inspect, said Lt. Col. George H. Peck, a spokesman at SAC headquarters in Omaha, Neb.

Those instructions will probably reflect the suspicions of the official board of inquiry that is investigating Tuesday's crash of a B-1B near Dyess Air Force Base, Texas.

Horrors remembered by Jews

By The Associated Press

FRANKFURT, West Germany — A Jewish leader said Wednesday descendants of victims will preserve the memory of the orgy of genocide launched 50 years ago with a night of horror the Nazis called Kristallnacht.

Heinz Galinski, leader of West Germany's 32,000 Jews, later went to a ceremony in East Germany, whose Jewish population numbers about 600. He urged both nations to make the anniversary a joint day of rememberance of the Nazi past.

Some Jews objected to Chancellor Helmut Kohl's presence in the Frankfurt synagogue where Galinksi spoke, and he was heckled from the balcony. They cite his 1985 visit with President Reagan to the Bitburg cemetery where 49 Nazi SS officers are buried, and an alleged insensitivity to Jewish concerns.

On Tuesday, the eve of Kristallnacht, someone spray-painted swastikas and pro-Nazi slogans on a synagogue.

City intersection rules fail to solve problems

People who aren't accustomed to driving in small towns may be having problems with all the uncontrolled intersections in Manhattan.

An uncontrolled intersection has no traffic control devices, such as a stop sign, a yield sign or traffic signals. But the term uncontrolled can be misleading because driving laws already dictate which car has the right of way.

Everyone on the road is supposed to pass a driver's test proving they know and understand the driving laws, but not everyone demonstrates such knowledge.

Either people need to brush up on the right-of-way laws or the city needs to install traffic control devices at more intersections.

In order for the City of Manhattan to set up traffic controls at an intersection, certain procedures must be followed.

If a specific intersection is of concern, upon written request, the city investigates whether to implement some kind of traffic control. When a request is made, the city analyzes the intersection by accident reports, traffic counts and other methods.

The city then decides whether to install traffic controls based on the analysis results and the Manual on Uniform Traffic Control Devices.

It is ironically unfortunate that before any action is taken, a certain number of accidents must occur at an intersection and a written request must be submitted by someone who is not only irritated, but ultimately takes action on that emotion.

The number of uncontrolled intersections is too many to count. The number of people having no familiarity with the right-of-way laws is frightening.

Of course, the most obvious and inexpensive solution to this problem are people who drive responsibly and courteously, but that's wishful thinking.

Communicate with city officials regarding dangerous intersections. Right-of-way laws are basic instruments for protecting pedestrians and drivers alike. Know them. Use them.

Other Perspectives

The University finally took the initiative and expanded the Memorial Union parking lot.

The increased space did mean the uprooting of numerous trees.

But this was a small price to pay. Now car owners don't have to fear falling tree limbs or messes left by the tree's inhabitants.

The new configuration of the parking lot is also in improvement. Wider driving lanes and a new entrance have made parking there much less stressful.

It was a simple solution to a growing problem.

The parking nightmare is over.

Now if only the sprinklers weren't assaulting passers-by on the university sidewalks. Isn't there a water shortage in the Hays area?

It's November. Aren't the grass and trees supposed to turn autumn-like colors anyway?

Watch the president-elect

Bush must keep promises

Commentary

CATHERINE DOUD
Collegian Columnist

Where do we go from here? Now that the presidential beauty contest is over, we are relieved from watching Bush, Dukakis, Quayle, and Bentsen strut in front of the cameras. No longer must we watch politicians shake the hands of semi-important people, make meaningless speeches about unimportant issues (like whether or not to say the Pledge of Allegiance), sidestep important issues (like the Central American conflict and the deficit) and argue over inane problems (like the proper height of a podium for a debate).

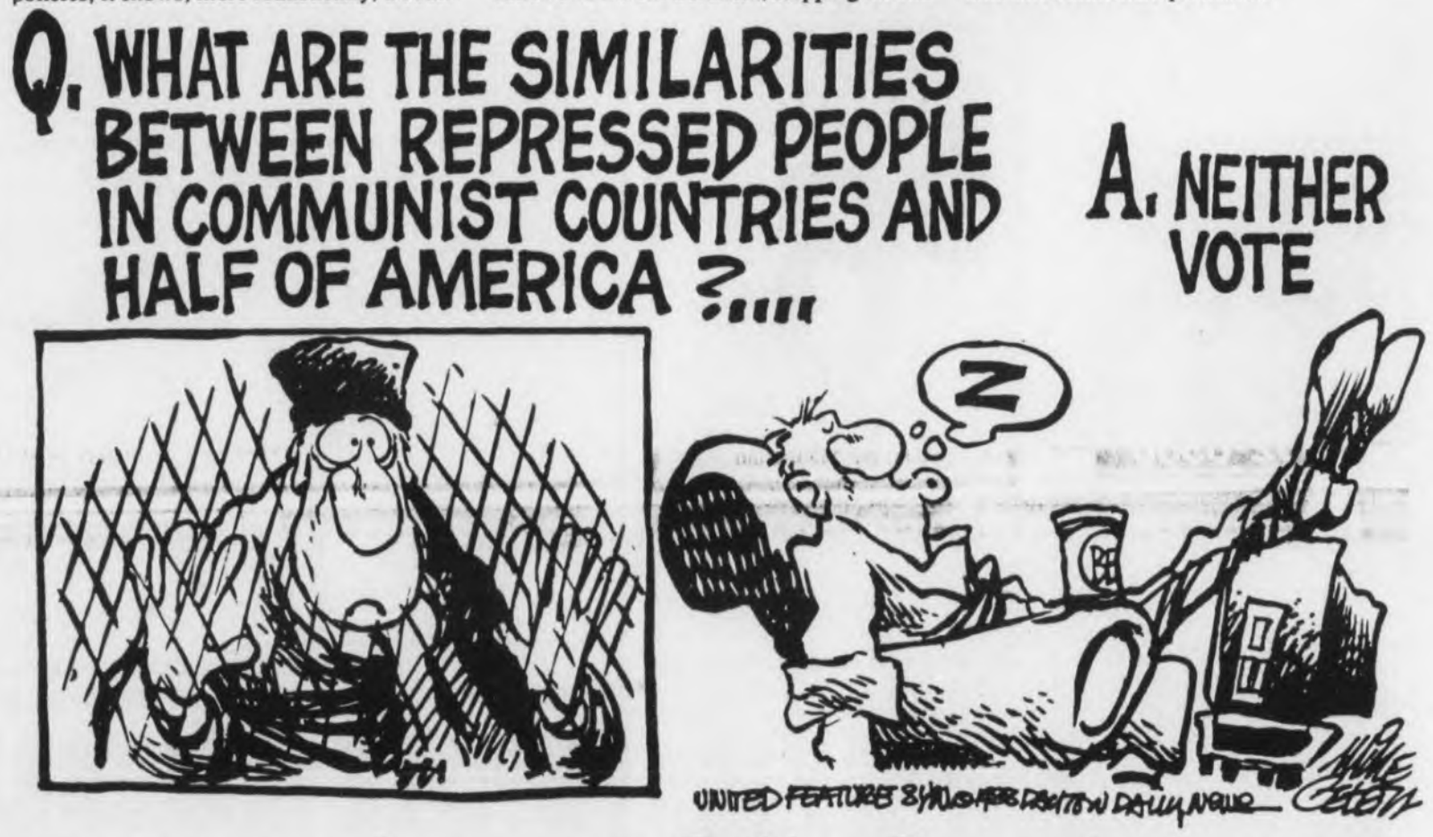
Whatever will we watch on television now that another fall of upheaval and change has ended?

But how much change has there been? Granted, the faces have changed, but the policies will probably stay the same.

At least nationally they probably will. America's voters have opted to maintain the policies of Reagan by electing his sidekick, Bush. Not that it was any big surprise. The polls gleefully had been telling us this since August, and Tuesday night it was confirmed.

But the race remained close to the finish, at least in the popular vote, which seems to suggest that maybe people aren't as unified in choosing to maintain the past eight year's policies as had been thought. While Reagan may call Tuesday's victory a landslide mandate from the people to continue the present policies, it shows, more realistically, a country split between voting for two evils, and eventually deciding to stay with the known evil instead of the unknown.

The known ... a high deficit, a growing distinction between the rich and the poor, unequal distribution of wealth, increased military budgets, clandestine dealing with foreign powers, powerful covert interference with foreign governments, terrorist activity sponsored in foreign nations resulting in human rights violations, increased funding of SDI, renewed production of chemical weapons, no support for the equal rights amendment or abortion and a trend of providing insufficient funds for education, environmental issues and social services.



The unknown ... a possibility of reduced military spending, tougher sanctions aganst South Africa, cessation of funding human rights violators in Central America, increases in funding education and the environment, stopping chemical weapons production, supporting the ERA and pro-choice and tougher stands on tax evaders rather than increased taxes.

It seems to be easier to stay with the known, a policy that consistently favors and is supported by big business and the rich minority.

However, it is also a policy that has increased jobs and kept the country out of a major military conflict. Perhaps this is what swayed the majority of voters to reaffirm this policy instead of venturing with another, regardless of how much they may dislike many of its basic points. They wish to ensure the peace of the nation, the security of the rich and jobs.

Despite winning by a notable margin, Bush should not take this as a complete mandate from the people to continue the current policies. Throughout his campaign, he has had to make several concessions to other groups to gain their support. He made such radical concessions as increasing environmental aid, supporting day care and promising not to cut other social programs.

It is now up to the public to make sure that these concessions do not fall to the wayside just because the beauty contest is over. If they fall to the wayside, then the two main advantages of electing Bush — jobs and peace — will be nullifed by the numerous attacks against human rights, social responsibility and environmental protection.

Guest Columnist

About 42 years ago in Nuremberg, Germany, the Allies sent a message to former Nazis and to the world that "just doing my job" is no excuse for complying with a moral outrage. Friday morning at the 81st Landon Lecture, K-State will have the opportunity to reconsider the Nuremberg trials and what significance they might have for the K-State community.

President Jon Wefald, himself a student of history, will set the tone for this event when he "does his job" and introduces Vernon Walters, U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations. But when Wefald "does his job" and welcomes Walters on behalf of K-State, will he also "do his job" as a scholar and a citizen?

Will his introduction consist of only highly selective facts to ensure that things run smoothly, or will some mention be made of events that might be easier to ignore?

Walters' record, though not well-known, is certainly well-documented. It includes connections to covert operations, coups, contra movements and dictatorships in Angola, Argentina, Brazil, Chile, El Salvador, Guatemala, Iran, Italy, Morocco and Nicaragua.

No doubt we will hear much from Walters about supporting democracy, protecting human rights and leading the "free world." But will we silently accept this as truth from the man who, according to journalist Claudia Wright, has been "directly or indirectly ... involved with overthrowing more governments than any other official ... in the U.S. government?"

In his introduction, Wefald will surely mention that Walters was deputy director of the CIA from 1972-76, but will he also mention some of Walters' tasks during those years? Will he point out, as does former CIA Angola Station Chief John Stockwell in his book "In Search of Enemies," that Walters solicited support from Brazilian and French mercenaries to wage the CIA's secret war in Angola?

Will Wefald note that the CIA's objectives in Angola were never to "win," but to prove the United States had "overcome" the Vietnam Syndrome and to make the war costly for "our enemies?" Will something be said about Angolans who are still paying those costs in money and suffering?

Most likely, there will be something said about the CIA's Distinguished Intelligence Medal, which Walters received in 1973. But will we hear why Walters received the medal? Was it, as John Ranelagh argues in his book "The Agency: The Rise and Decline of the CIA," due to Walters' efforts to cover the CIA's role in Watergate?

Will the introduction include comments about Walters' role in the overthrow of Iranian Premier Mohammed Mossadegh and the reinstallation of the shah? Will we hear about Walters' cooperation with Argentine neo-Nazis in organizing and training the Contras in Nicaragua?

But Wefald is not our only representative; he is not alone. Will we, along with our other designated leaders, sit on the stage and in front of it and play the role of loyal public servants and citizens? If so, will this decision sacrifice moral integrity for the sake of decorum? Will we and our leaders stand behind Walters and attach our names to events that most of us would be ashamed to call our own?

Will we do our job by applauding? Will we say nothing to challenge the callousness and hypocrisy of our elected officials in Washington — in effect signing our names to a program of murder, torture and adventurism? Will we ask ourselves if this is the type of person we should honor as a distinguished career diplomat or who we should denounce as a criminal of the most despicable kind?

Will we choose to laud Walters as "a distinguished guest" when, in fact, the record suggests he should be called something else? Will we consider only Walters' accomplishments in an attempt to convince ourselves that he is, indeed, the role model we expect our government officials to be?

If the Nuremberg trials established anything, it is that all citizens and not just government officials are responsible for public policy. Hopefully, all of us can tell the next generation that we faced up to that responsibility.

Good endorsement

Editor,

I wish to commend the Nov. 1 endorsement by the Collegian of Sally Howard-Clayton for Student Body President. Not only did the endorsement set precedent, but it was also a solid example of the integrity of the Collegian. In the vast field of candidates, Howard-Clayton is the only one to address each of the deep issues and, therefore, offer an alternative voice and electoral option for those of us who had begun to wonder whether or not the Student Senate had truly lost sight of its intended purpose.

In the wake of the recent Student impeachment fiasco, this is a reaffirming vote of confidence that the democratic process in the K-State Student Senate has not died a death attributed to terminal, inane legislative cancer.

Chemistry team continuing testing

By The Collegian Staff

A team of chemists headed by William Fateley, professor of chemistry, is continuing to use lasers to determine if hazardous chemicals are present above abandoned landfills with a grant of $1 million received a year ago from the Environmental Protection Agency.

The EPA recently granted an additional $153,219 for a mobile laboratory to carry the laser equipment.

The team of chemists consists of Fateley and Bob Hammaker, professor in chemistry; Marty Spartz and Mark Witkowski, graduate students working on their doctorates; and Jonathan Fateley, research assistant in chemistry.

The team can detect any chemical in the air at concentrations as minute as one part per billion.

"The laser, which makes very accurate measurements, is controlling the experiment," said William Fateley, who recently received the William F. Meggers Award for the best scientific paper in 1987 published in Applied Spectroscopy.

The laser equipment is portable, gives an almost instantaneous reading of the chemicals in the air and has the advantage of not disturbing the air.

The laser puts infrared radiation across the landfill, he said.

"Molecules have 'fingerprints.' Their fingerprints are found by the laser. Knowing the fingerprints, we can identify the molecules and how much in parts-per-billion there is by the fingerprints," William Fateley said.

The EPA will designate the first on-site test of landfills in Kansas. The team from K-State will then investigate whether or not the landfill has a problem.

Architecture expert to give talk

By Jody Hundley
Collegian Reporter

Stuart Wrede, director of the Department of Architecture and Design at the Museum of Modern Art in New York City, and an "important voice with the profession of architecture," is the featured speaker at 8 p.m. today in the Union Little Theatre.

Wrede, a native of Helsinki, Finland, is the 37th lecturer in the Oscar Ekdahl Memorial Lectures and the first of the 1988-89 academic year.

"The director of the Department of Architecture and Design (at the MOMA) has historically been an important voice with the profession of architecture and the American culture," said Eugene Kremer, professor of architecture.

"Exhibits and books by the director are considered wise and thoughtful. The architecture community takes notice," he said.

Wrede's topic is "The Ruin Reconstructed: The Town Hall at Saynatsalo by Alvar Aalto." Aalto, a Finn architect who practiced in his homeland, was one of the most important architects in history, Kremer said.

"The faculty and students will have the opportunity to hear a noted scholar explore some ideas about relations of a building to the concept of a ruin building," he said.

Wrede began studies at Yale University in 1961 and graduated with a bachelor's degree. He received a master's degree in architecture in 1970, Kremer said.

"He's a registered architect in Connecticut and in Helsinki," he said. "This indicates he still has strong ties to Finland."

Wrede's project experience is focused on residential projects, ranging from additions to single-family residences to new neighborhoods for 25,000 people, Kremer said.

Wrede has also served as a faculty member or critic at the architecture schools at Columbia University, Yale, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Ohio State University, Montana State University and the Institute for Architecture and Urban Studies in New York, Kremer said.

The Oscar Ekdahl Memorial Lectures began in the fall of 1974 and are named after the former K-State student. Two to three lectures are delivered each academic year, Kremer said.

"The lecture series was founded more than a decade ago," he said. "It is a living memorial honoring the Topeka architect, Ekdahl. The series brings practitioners, teachers, critics, theorists and artists to the campus.

"The lectures are meant to inform and to challenge, to reinforce and to complement the educational programs of the College of Architecture and Design, thus, to honor architect Oscar Ekdahl," Kremer said.

Nebraskans reject nuclear referendum

By The Associated Press

Nebraskans rejected a referendum that would have made the state the first to withdraw from a low-level nuclear waste compact.

With all 1,878 precincts reporting, Initiative 402 failed 403,026 votes, or 64 percent, to 224,570, or 36 percent, in favor of withdrawal.

The measure would have allowed Nebraska to withdraw from the Central Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact it joined five years ago. It would also have required voter approval before a nuclear dump could be built in the state.

Dr. Samuel Mehr, chairman of Nebraskans Against 402, said he was "pleased to see that the people of the state are willing to go forward with the compact process."

"While we will disband as a committee tonight, many of the group have expressed a desire to work to ensure that the compact system works for all Nebraskans," he said.

Sam Welsch, head of the grassroots organization that put Initiative 402 on the ballot, said members of Nebraskans for the Right to Vote were disappointed, but not defeated.

The utility industry pumped more than $1.5 million into advertising against 402. Welsch said his Nebraskans For The Right to Vote spent between $55,000 and $65,000.

Some worried that a defection by Nebraska could trigger walkouts by states whose membership in regional compacts is controversial, threatening the entire compact system.

Nebraska, which joined its five-state compact in 1983, was chosen in December on a 4-1 vote as the site of the compact disposal site. Nebraska was the sole "no" vote, while Kansas, Louisiana, Arkansas and Oklahoma favored the Nebraska location.

Sculpture intrigues students

By Scot Dye
Collegian Reporter

The K-State campus is decorated with many forms of sculpture. One sculpture that has many students asking "What is it?" is north of King Hall.

It has several nicknames. Some say it is a claw. Some say it is a phallic symbol. But perhaps it is known best as "The Fork."

"I probably had an idea in mind when I designed it, but I left it untitled. I let people decide for themselves what it is," said James Wentz, designer of the sculpture.

"I wouldn't put a phallic symbol on campus. I don't feel the need for that," he said.

Although it officially has no title, there are some general facts about "The Fork," as well as other sculptures around the campus.

Made of laminated polyester resin and epoxy resin, "The Fork" was designed and constructed as part of an art situation workshop at K-State in the summer of 1969 by Wentz, who was a sophomore in art education.

"It was a cooperative effort, a class project that numerous people helped. I'm not the sole person that put it together," Wentz said.

The class, offered during the summer semesters of 1969-71, was designed to give students in art, architecture, and landscape architecture hands-on experience with art, said John Vogt, associate professor of art.

Vogt said that since much of the work these students do tends to be theoretical, they never get to carry a project from start to finish.

"(The class) involved these people working together and coming up with different ideas for different sites. It gave them an opportunity to work together, to go through all the

When it's cold there's always CHILI

"It's good for what ails you," boast chili enthusiasts. The medicinal value of chili has been documented to cure everything from malaria to gastrointestinal disorders, and some say it saved more lives during the Depression than the Red Cross.

Texans have successfully lobbied their legislature to enshrine chili as the state's official dish. Some Texans have requested "that the United States Congress should pass a law making it mandatory for all restaurants the world over to follow the Texas recipe for chili if they are to serve a bowl of Red."

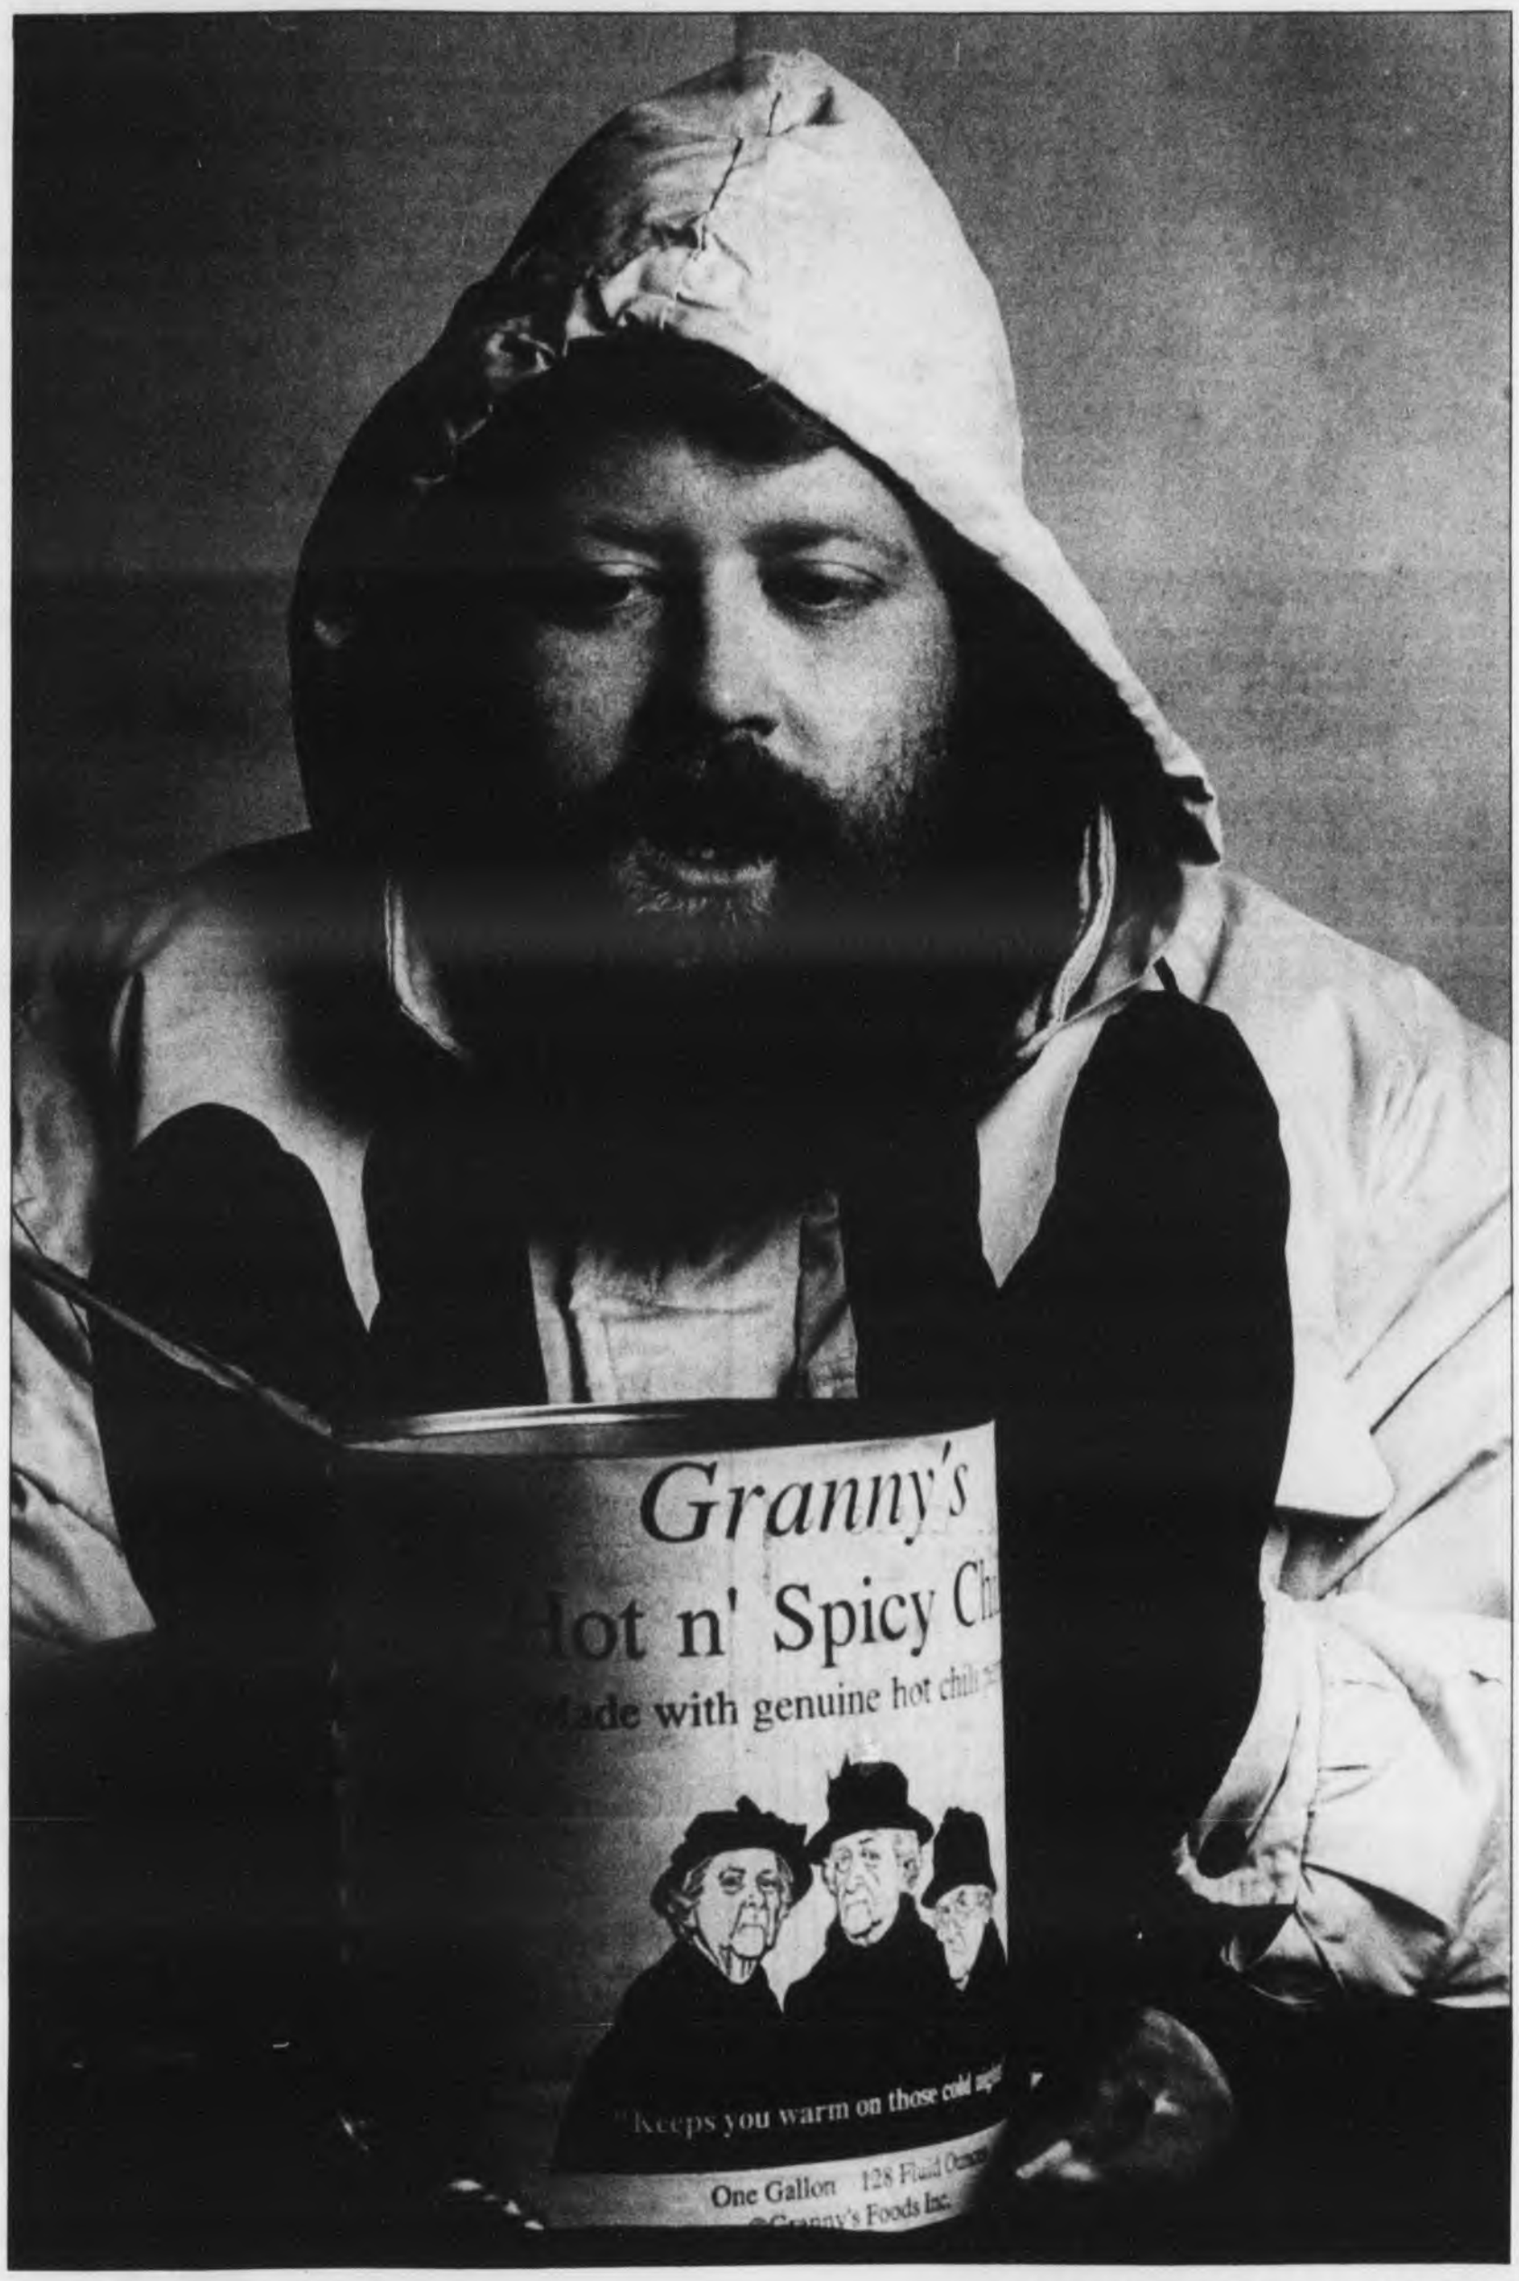
The public forum that has evolved to accommodate chili mania is known as the cook-off. The cook-off is the culinary event where people gather to create the best bowl of chili and to have the most fun doing it. Although Texas may boast of having the most cook-offs, they cannot claim to have originated it. The Greeks started the idea, and Manhattan can boast of its own chili cook-off each fall in Aggieville.

Pickled or ground hot peppers are used as spices because they add zap from capsaicin, a substance characterized by acrid vapors and burning taste.

It's this burning taste that chili lovers long for in a great bowl of Texas-style chili. As temperatures outside drop, Manhattan chili lovers are coming into the peak of the chili season.

"Winter is the cold season, and soups like chili are a big hit in the dining halls," said Mary Molt, director of Derby Food Center. "When we serve chili in the dining rooms, it's on an all-you-can-eat basis, and we usually serve out 25,000 servings."

Some chili lovers do not wait for the cold. Regardless of the temperature, chili is on the table.



"We sell chili year-round. However, November through March are the peak months," said John Heritage, owner of the Lone Star Cafe. "People who like hot chili like it all year-round.

"We have two different styles of chili. Triple X is our hottest, and its sales really don't seem to be seasonal," Heritage said.

The cafe does not use beans or tomatoes in its chili. Its seasoning comes from freshly ground chili peppers. The recipe specifies sirloin beef.

Many fraternities and sororities serve chili during the winter. Dorothy Schmidt, Delta Delta Delta housemother, said their cook has chili on the menu about every other week during the winter.

"The cook makes chili with and without beans, and we serve it with grated cheese, onions, and crackers. It's popular," she said.

RECIPES

Derby Chili

2 lb. ground beef
¼ c. chopped onions
2 cloves fresh minced garlic
2 tsp. salt
4 tsp. chili powder
2 tsp. sugar
¼ tsp. ground cumin
¼ tsp. ground pepper
22 oz. diced tomatoes
8 oz. tomato puree
2 lb. red beans
1 c. water

Cook meat in kettle until it loses its color. Stir often to prevent lumps from forming. Drain fat. Combine onions through black pepper with meat. Add tomatoes, tomato puree, beans, and water with meat mixture. Simmer, stirring frequently. Serve with shredded cheese, sliced jalapeno peppers, chopped onions, diced tomatoes and crackers.

Texas Chili #2

2 tb. vegetable oil
2 lb. stewing beef cubed
2 c. chopped onions
2 green bell peppers, seeded and chopped
2 cloves garlic minced
22-oz. can tomato paste
2½ c. water
2 pickled jalapeno peppers, rinsed, seeded and chopped
1½ tb. chili powder
½ tsp. crushed red pepper
½ tsp. salt
½ tsp. dried oregano
½ tsp cumin
2 (25½ -oz.) can pinto beans, drained

In a large, heavy pan, heat oil and brown beef cubes on all sides. Add onions, bell peppers and garlic, and fry them with beef for about 5 minutes. Add all the remaining ingredients except beans and simmer the chili for 2½ hours or until the meat is tender. Add beans and simmer 30 minutes longer.

Mouth of Hell Chili

2 large onions, chopped
2 tb. oil
2 lb. lean chili meat
2 large cans of tomatoes
2 small cans of tomato sauce
2 tsp. sugar
2 tsp. ground comino
2 tsp. paprika
2 large cloves garlic
22 oz. beer (the rest of the six-pack to be consumed while cooking)
2 fresh jalapeno peppers
5 tb. chili powder
salt and cayenne pepper to taste (hotness of chili depends on how much cayenne)
2 c. cooked pinto beans (optional)
2 tb. tequila (at least 250 proof)

Saute chopped onion. Add chili meat and stir until grey. Add remaining ingredients except for tequila and beans. Cook until thick, about 2½ hours. At this point, if you like beans in your chili, add the two cups cooked pinto beans — but make sure there aren't any Texans around. When ready to serve, put into a large bowl, pour tequila over and light.

Goat chili

8 lb. goat meat, chili-ground or in ¼ -inch cubes
5 tb. chili powder
2 garlic cloves, crushed
2 tsp. red pepper
2 tb. salt
2 beers

Cook meat in heavy skillet until lightly browned. Add dry seasoning and stir. Pour in beer. Cook uncovered for 45 minutes. Serve with a side of beans, corn bread and onion slice.

Exhibit examines printer techniques

By Melissa Paul
Collegian Reporter

The exhibit at the Union Art Gallery is not only a visual experience, but also a learning experience.

The display, titled "Print Types," is a traveling exhibit from the Print Consortium in St. Joseph, Mo. Chosen by the Union Programming Council, it will be displayed until Nov. 18.

The exhibit exposes a wide variety of printmaking techniques. The four main categories of printmaking are intaglio, relief, planographic, and serigraphic.

Gary Woodward, associate professor of art, said the exhibit was informative and comprehensive.

"I learned a few things, too," he said. "I thought it was super."

Intaglio is produced by incising lines in a metal plate. The surface is inked, then wiped free of excess. A damp sheet of paper is placed on the surface and run through a press, which forces the paper into the inked grooves. This transfers the image to the paper.

The opposite of intaglio is relief. Areas that are not to have ink are cut away and the ridges are inked. The plate and paper run through a press and the ink on the ridges transfers to the paper.

Planographic prints are produced on much like dittos. Greasy materials hold the ink in the shape of the drawing. When pressure is applied, the paper picks up the wet, inked areas but not the greased areas.

Serigraphic prints, which work much like mimeographs, are better known as silkscreens. It works similar to stencils, in which ink is forced through openings in a stretched piece of silk.

Print types, such as etchings and lithographs, are derived from these categories.

Jennifer White, sophomore in journalism and mass communications and chairwoman of the UPC Arts Committee, said the committee chose this display because it thought that it was something from which people could learn.

She said most artists send information or slides to the committee, which then decides what to display based on what it believes the University would want to see.

Bush likely to clash with Congress

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President-elect George Bush is headed for likely conflict with a strengthened Democratic majority in Congress, but Republicans say he can still enjoy a honeymoon if he gives assertive and moderate direction on the budget deficit, housing and the environment.

Democrats go into the 101st Congress with slightly greater majorities in both Houses. In the Senate, the current 54-46 advantage appeared likely to be padded by one or two seats, depending largely on the outcome of a cliffhanger in Florida. And House Democrats appeared headed for a net gain of five seats.

Sen. Rudy Boschwitz, R-Minn., chairman of the National Republican Senatorial Committee, said he was "not overjoyed at the results" and acknowledged: "The question is, whether there will be a honeymoon. ... Certainly there will be considerable conflict between their agenda and our agenda."

"I'm not sure what the mandate is," he said, adding that by retaining a Republican White House and a Democratic Congress, voters are saying "they're relatively satisfied with the conditions that they find."

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said the electorate reaffirmed the direction Democrats have set on trade, the environment and family issues.

Kerry said that unless Bush is willing to work "hand-in-hand" with Democrats in Congress "it's going to be contentious and difficult. The ball is in his court."

Bush seemed to acknowledge that, saying upon arrival at Andrews Air Force Base in Washington: "I don't want us to talk at each other, I want us to talk to each other."

Boschwitz said he agreed with Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., that "this race was not about coattails."

But he said major problems need to be addressed in the areas of the budget deficit, the environment and low-income housing.

Boschwitz said he believed Bush would begin with "a very aggressive team" headed by top adviser James A. Baker III, the secretary of state-designate.

"If there is one of the messages of the campaign, it is that liberalism, at least as some people define it, is not as much in vogue as it was," Boschwitz said, noting that Democrats in Nebraska, Ohio and New Jersey "ran away from Dukakis."

Tuesday's results marked the first time since 1960 that the party that lost the White House gained seats in both houses of Congress.

Democrats unseated GOP incumbents Lowell Weicker in Connecticut, Chic Hecht in Nevada and David Karnes in Nebraska, and picked up a previously Republican seat in Virginia. Republicans offset that by knocking off incumbent John Melcher in Montana and converting Mississippi's Democratic seat to their column. Florida's race between Democratic Rep. Buddy MacKay and GOP Rep. Connie Mack remained too close to call and largely dependent on the outcome of 100,000 absentee ballots.

One early sign of potential friction came not from the Democrats, but from Dole, who will be in charge of shepherding Bush's legislative agenda through the new Congress. As returns rolled in Tuesday night, Dole criticized Bush for turning aside requests to help Mack in Florida. And he said when Hecht pleaded for help in Nevada, Bush "flew over it."

Dole also has made public comments doubting whether Bush can honor his "read my lips" vow not to increase any taxes, and has hinted that the Bush campaign's idea to control the deficit through a "flexible freeze" lacks substance.

An unanswered question stemming from Tuesday's voting was what will happen in Indiana, where Republican Sen. Dan Quayle will leave his congressional seat to take over the vice presidency. A successor will have to be appointed by the governor, and it was assumed that Quayle would resign from the Senate early to allow that choice to be made by Republican Gov. Robert Orr, whose term expires in January.

AIA gives 'Cats tough exhibition

By Mike Rouse
Sports Writer

The K-State men's basketball team played its first scrimmage Wednesday night in Bramlage Coliseum, edging past the Athletes in Action 97-91.

Although Wildcat coach Lon Kruger said he was pleased with his young squad in this exhibition game, he also realized what the Wildcats will have to do when it comes down to a real game situation.

"We showed a lot of good balance and activity down low. I thought in the first half we were pretty solid," Kruger said. "It was typical of what to expect from this type of game.

"This kind of game shows that there are a lot of things to work on in the next three weeks."

In the game, Kruger played a lot of people and he realized that he will have to do that this year in order to win ball games. He said that there are about 11 or 12 kids who come to practice and play hard because "they know they are going to play.

"We will have to play a lot of people and we want to play with intensity and play hard. And to do that you need to play fresh people," Kruger said.

AIA head coach Rle Nichols said he was pleased with how the 'Cats played against his team, but noted there are a lot of teams that are about the same as K-State.

"They do a nice job of getting the ball down low. They are comparable with the rest of the teams on the schedule," Nichols said.

Junior guard Steve Henson and senior forward Fred McCoy showed that will probably lead the way for the Wildcats this season as they contributed 18 and 16 points respectively.

Kruger was pleased by how well his team handled the pressure AIA put on them down the stretch, when the game was close.

"There are so many new kids we're just working on the basics, we haven't introduced working on full-court pressure, but we looked solid most of the game," Kruger said.

Some of the new kids Kruger is excited about are Billy Ray Smith, Todd Stanfield and LaKeith Humphrey.

"Billy Ray made a lot of solid plays," Kruger said.

Smith scored 13 points, including a three-pointer in the second half.

"I hit my shots when I needed to. I was mainly an inside player in junior college, but coach was working with my outside jumper," Smith said.

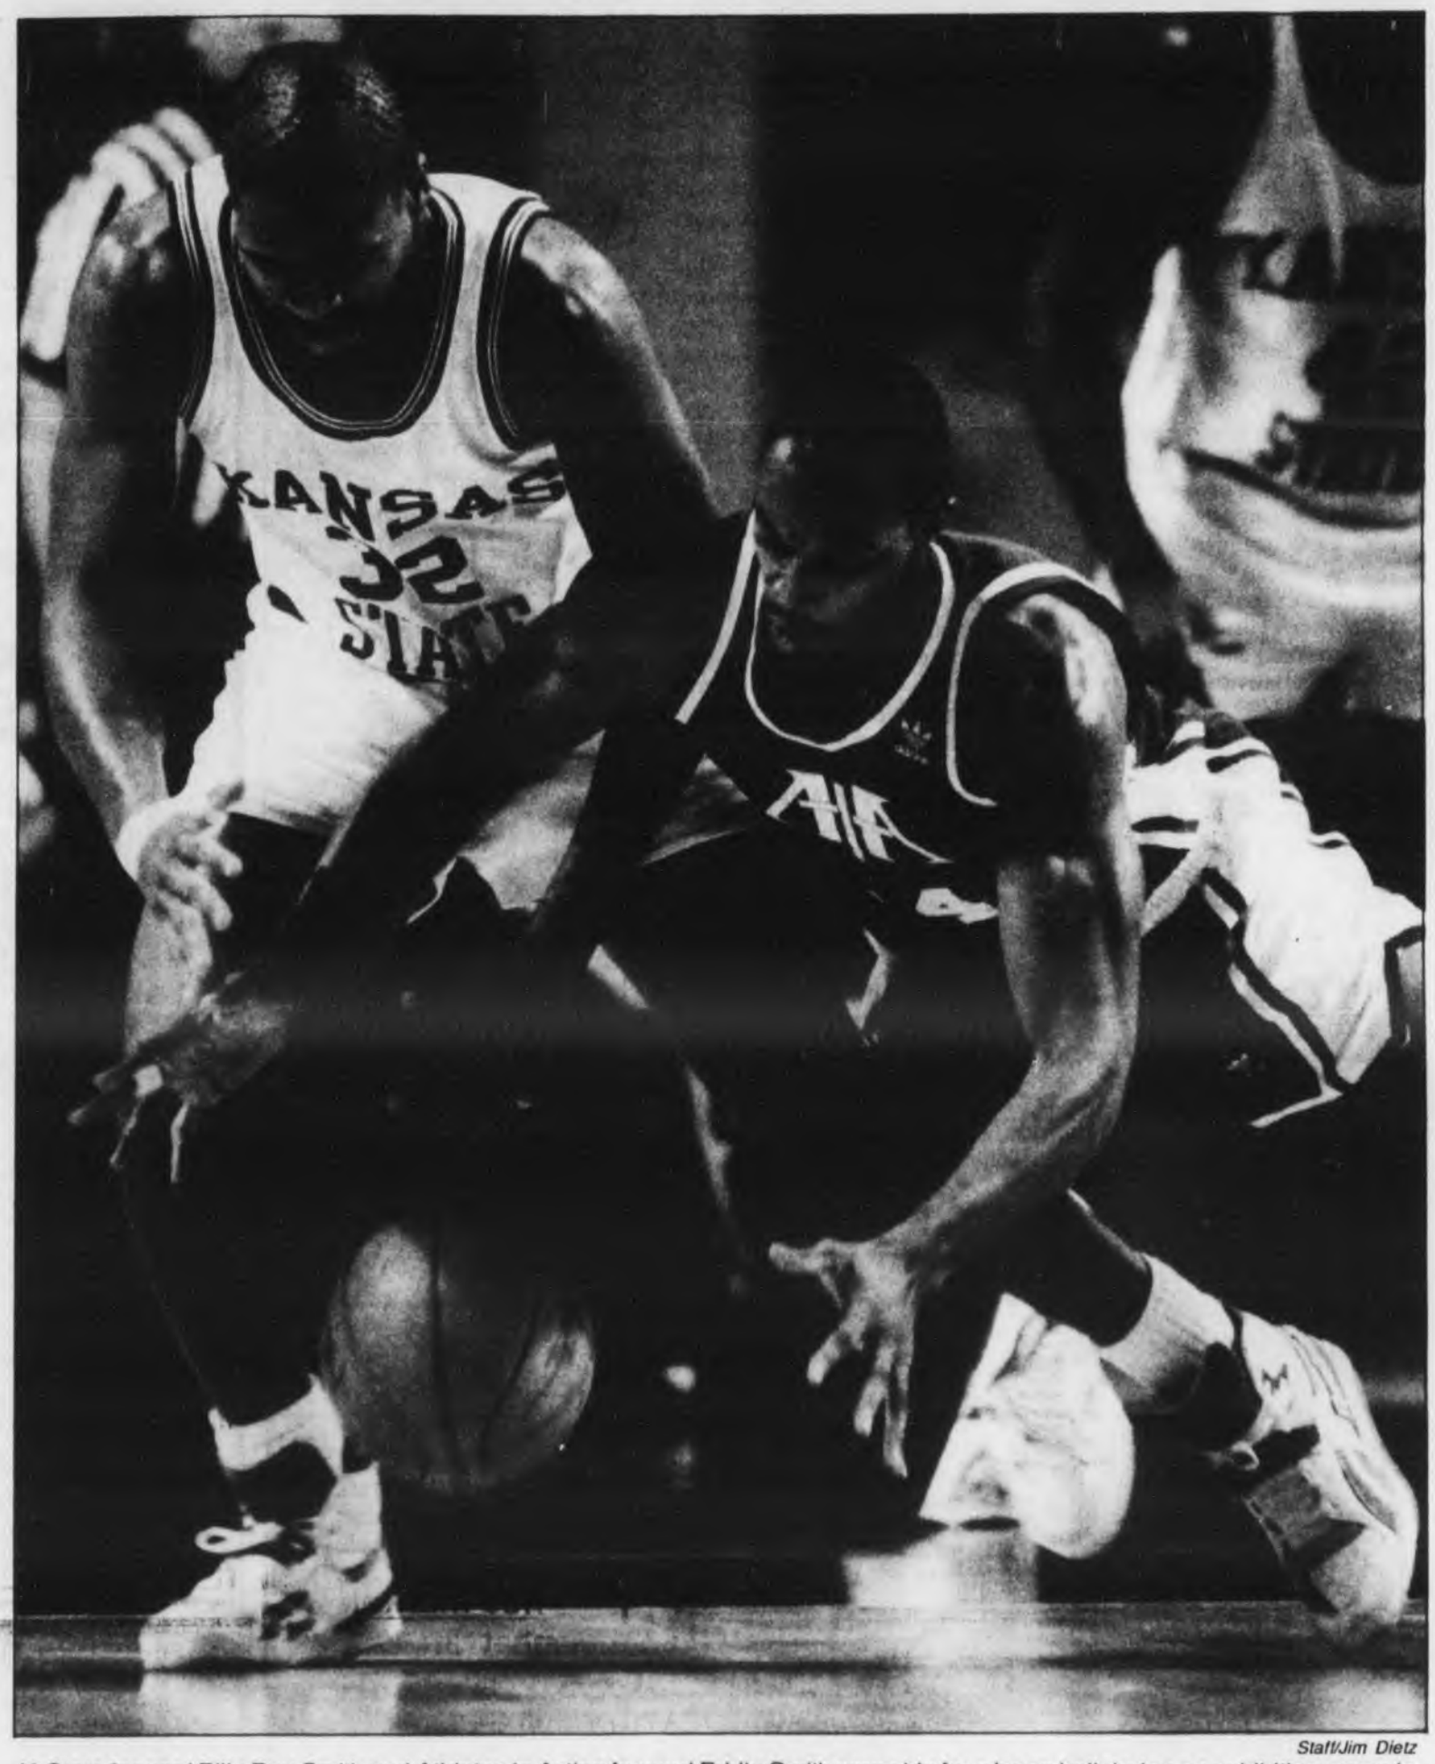
Kruger gave Stanfield and Humphrey some experience late in the game by taking out Henson when AIA put on the full-court pressure.

"It gave Todd and Keith some great experience because they have never been in that situation before and they need to be there when it comes later in the season," Kruger said.

He added that the balance at the guards handling the ball this year is better than last year.

Stanfield received his first start of his career and showed he has gained experience from last year by adding seven points, including a three-pointer. Humphrey was perfect from the field and added 11 points.

AIA, which is made up of ex-college and NBA players, was led in scoring by Lorenzo Romar who contributed 31 points. Wichita native Eddie Smith added 17 points.



Henson said he felt the 'Cats did some good things and the performance showed where they are right now and what they need to do coming up.

"I think the first half showed where we are so far this year. We learned a lot tonight because they showed us what we need to work on," he said.

Contract problems may force ex-Jayhawk to sit out season

By The Associated Press

RICHFIELD, Ohio — Danny Manning remains willing to sit out the entire NBA season unless the Los Angeles Clippers meet his contract demands, Manning's agent said Wednesday.

"They said they'd pay us whatever they were allowed to under the salary cap," said agent Ron Grinker, of Cincinnati, after the Clippers lost 108-91 to the Cleveland Cavaliers. "Once we got the figures from the league office ... then they changed the terms again."

Manning, the first player picked in this year's draft, watched Wednesday's game from a loge at the Richfield Coliseum.

"Danny Manning told them yesterday he's not going to go to L.A. (for contract talks) unless they're ready to sign him," Grinker said. "He also told them he's prepared to sit out the season, which Danny doesn't want to do."

Mossman signs one; Kruger waiting

By Chris Hays
Sports Editor

On Wednesday, Lady Cat coach Matilda Mossman took advantage of the first day that collegiate basketball coaches could sign prospective recruits to national letters of intent by signing a Kansas blue-chipper.

Meanwhile, Wildcat coach Lon Kruger remained silent while still hoping to sign two players who have orally committed to K-State.

Mossman landed 5-foot-9 sharp-shooter Kelly Moylan of St. Mary's High School.

"Kelly has great perimeter shooting ability, which is something our team needs badly," Mossman said. "In fact, she probably shoots the basketball as well as anyone in the state and maybe better than anyone on our team right now."

While good luck was on the side of the Lady Cats, Kruger had not announced any signings Wednesday, although two players were expected to sign with the Wildcats at the beginning of the early-signing period, which lasts one week.

Early reports said that J.R. Rider, from Encinal High School in Oakland, Calif., and Carl Weldon, from Allen County Community College, had committed orally to K-State and it was a matter of going through the formalities of signing the letter of intent.

Rider, a 6-foot-5 swingman, averaged 21 points and 11 rebounds for Encinal last year, while Weldon, a 6-foot-3½ guard, averaged 10 points and 6 assists for Allen County.

K-State also appears to be in the running for 6-foot-10 Rockhurst High School product Chris Heller, but the Wildcats have some stiff competition. Heller is being sought by, among others, Missouri, Kansas and UCLA. Heller apparently won't sign during the early period.

Agent says Manning given money

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The agent representing former Kansas basketball star Danny Manning confirmed Wednesday Manning received small loans from Mike Marshall, a former player allegedly involved in violations that resulted in NCAA probation for national champion KU.

Agent Mike Grinker made his remarks in a telephone interview from his Cincinnati office with The Kansas City Star after Marshall was quoted in a story in the Nov. 14 edition of Sports Illustrated.

The magazine reported that Marshall, who was closely associated with former KU coach Larry Brown, made a cash payment and bought a plane ticket for a potential recruit and also made loans to Manning and other players.

"It's true, yeah," Grinker said. "He gave him $5, $7, $10 when his father (former KU assistant coach Ed Manning) was out of town.

"I'm sure if you ask Mike Marshall, he'll tell you Danny always paid him back. Danny thought nothing of it. He didn't consider Mike Marshall to be a part of the basketball program," Grinker said. Marshall's whereabouts were not known.

Manning, who led the underdog Jayhawks to the national basketball championship last spring, was the first pick in the National Basketball Association draft this year but has not signed a contract with the Los Angeles Clippers. Brown returned to the NBA as head coach of the San Antonio Spurs after leading KU to the championship.

In an interview with an NCAA investigator, at which a Sports Illustrated reporter was present, Marshall said Brown knew about the plane ticket and cash payments to the family of Vincent Askew, a Memphis State player who wanted to transfer to KU. Askew wound up not transferring to KU.

In its investigation, the NCAA said payments and tickets worth $1,244 were given to Askew by Brown and others during a 10-day period in the summer of 1986 — one of the most serious violations that led to three years of probation for KU. The NCAA investigation discovered that Askew also received clothing and money in return for work that was never performed.

David Berst, assistant NCAA director for enforcement, confirmed Wednesday that a Sports Illustrated reporter was present at two NCAA interviews.

"He did sit in on two interviews but did not explain to our person that he was a writer. He was represented to be a friend ... or someone who was going to work out with the player, the person we were going to interview," Berst said.

"I am somewhat concerned that an individual would participate without identifying himself. I have already made those thoughts known to the writer."

Berst said loans made to a player by a representative of the university's athletic interests would be a violation of NCAA rules but he said he did not know whether the alleged loans to Manning would fit into that category.

"I would have to review the information first and determine if this is new," Berst said.

Grinker said neither he nor Manning had been contacted by the NCAA.

Marshall, 26, a native of Shelbyville, Ky., played one season at KU, then transferred to McNeese State, which also is on NCAA probation. Marshall said he received "thousands of dollars" from McNeese State boosters when he played there in 1985-86.

"He was here and we are on probation, and he was at Kansas and they are on probation. That may be a connection," said McNeese State basketball coach Steve Welch, who said he arrived at McNeese a year after Marshall played there.

At KU, Marshall and Brown were so close that others at the school referred to Marshall as Brown's son.

Viola wins AL Cy Young

NEW YORK — Frank Viola, the Minnesota Twins lefthander who led the major leagues in victories with a 24-7 record, was named winner of the 1988 American League Cy Young Award on Wednesday.

Viola received 27 of a possible 28 first-place votes and 138 of a possible 140 points from the Baseball Writers' Association of America. Dennis Eckersley of the Oakland Athletics got the other first-place vote and was second with 52 points.

Mark Gubicza of the Kansas City Royals was third with 26 points, Dave Stewart of Oakland had 16, Bruce Hurst of the Boston Red Sox had 12 and teammate Roger Clemens, Cy Young winner in 1986 and 1987, had eight.

Rozelle suspends 2 for drugs

NEW YORK — Commissioner Pete Rozelle, who hoped the early spate of substance-abuse penalties in the NFL was reducing the league's drug problem, Wednesday suspended two more players — Houston's Doug Smith and Buffalo's Hal Garner.

Smith and Garner both were suspended for 30 days for what NFL spokesman Joe Browne said, as in the past, were "violations of the league's substance abuse policy."

That brought to 22 the number set down this year — 21 for 30 days as second-time violators and running back Tony Collins of the Indianapolis Colts for at least a year for a third offense.

Garagiola quits NBC baseball

NEW YORK — Joe Garagiola, one of the first former athletes to become a star sportscaster, is leaving NBC after 27 years because the network delayed negotiations on a new contract and left the impression he was no longer wanted.

"It was an unfortunate case where dandruff turned into cancer," his business manager, Felix Shagin, said Tuesday.

Garagiola, 62, sent a resignation letter to NBC Sports president Arthur Watson last week.

Course teaches trading

Class focuses on commodity markets

By Eva Craig
Collegian Reporter

"It's the only class on campus or in the nation, to my knowledge, that can reimburse your tuition," said William Tierney Jr., instructor of the seminar in commodity markets course and Extension agricultural economist.

Students participating in the agricultural economics 641 course use their own money for trading in the commodities and futures markets.

"They have the risk of losing it all or winning a bunch," Tierney said.

The class is a student commodity pool, or SCP, that meets once a week for one hour of credit to present and discuss trade recommendations in the commodities and futures markets. Each student in the class contributes $100 to the pool, which ensures their vote for trade recommendations, he said.

The class divides into groups to prepare and present trade recommendations. The recommendations consist of a statement of the proposed trade and profit objective, a fundamental, technical and historical analysis of the market and the hazards involved in the trade, according to the course outline.

After hearing all recommendations, the pool decides which commodities or futures to approve. Changes in trading can be made only at class meetings, Tierney said.

Tierney is the pool operator and is liable for the SCP's margin requirements, which limits his financial exposure.

He said the idea for the course stemmed from his exposure to Extension marketing education seminars for farmers.

Follow-up surveys about class participants, conducted by the Extensionists teaching these classes, revealed that few had changed their marketing practices.

Fear of mistakes and intimidation by the complexity of marketing techniques were cited in the surveys as the major barrier in implementation of the techniques, Tierney said.

In the Extension seminars and in commodity and futures marketing classes taught at K-State and other schools, commodity paper-trading games are used, he said. Paper-trading games involve a fixed amount of paper money and simulated futures or options trades.

"The one weakness of these games is there is no real pain and no real gain as a consequence of the students' trade," Tierney said.

To prove his theory, Tierney cited a State of Indiana Department of Education study on learning and retention. According to the study, 80 percent of direct experience will be retained, compared with 10 percent retention of auditory experience, 15 percent retention of visual experience and 40 percent retention of verbally communicated experience.

The class had 29 students the first time it was offered, in the spring semester of 1988. The students approved seven of the 10 proposed recommendations. Although five of the seven either broke even or made a profit, the pool lost money.

"We lost a minimal amount compared to our investment," said Kris Dejmal, senior in agricultural economics. Each student lost $1.70.

"I was pleased with the outcome," Dejmal said. "The potential was there to lose everything."

The two losing trades were in mini-cattle futures contracts, which are half the size of full-size contracts. If all trades had been executed in full-size contracts, the pool would have grossed a profit of $1,925, according to research produced by the class.

The class is offered for graduate or undergraduate credit. Grades are based on class participation, quality of trade recommendations and their critiques rather than quizzes or tests, Tierney said.

Marching band to play in K.C.

By Susan E. Faler
Collegian Reporter

Don't be surprised if Sunday afternoon, while watching the Kansas City Chiefs football game, K-State's "Pride of Wildcat Land" shows up on the screen.

The K-State Marching Band will perform in Arrowhead Stadium during halftime of the Chiefs game against the Cincinnati Bengals.

Sunday has even been declared K-State Day at the stadium.

Members of the K-State Alumni Association also will be attending the game. It plans "to have a big to-do in the parking lot before the game," said Stan Finck, director of the band.

"In the past, the Chiefs had two separate days that recognized K-State: the K-State Alumni Day and K-State Band Day.

"We called the Chiefs' sales office and put the two together," said Becky Klingler, director of the Alumni Association. "We have a pre-game party before the game and then the band will perform at halftime."

"In the past, we've sold about 1,100 tickets, and we plan on having about 50 (tickets) sold this year," Klingler said.

The Chiefs' policy is to give bands from this area first choice of the game at which they will perform, and then other universities that have applied to perform are chosen for the other games, Finck said.

"We've performed at a Chiefs' game every year that I've been here, and that's been six years," Finck said. "K-State, KU and Missouri get first choice of which game they perform at."

The Chiefs also have a Kansas City High School Day which most of the area's high school bands attend.

The band will use the money raised from the Music Run, their annual fund-raiser, for the trip.

People planning to attend the pre-game party should bring their own beverages and food. For reservations or for more information, contact Becky Klingler at 532-6260.

Drama presents realism

By Brad Atchison
Collegian Reviewer

For the third time in less than three months, the K-State Players have assembled a production to grace the stage of Nichols Hall. The Players' production of "Angels Fall" opens at 8 tonight and will also be performed Friday, Saturday and Nov. 16-19.

"Angels Fall" is a realistic drama from the pen of American playwright Lanford Wilson. Wilson's work has earned him a place among the most successful contemporary Broadway playwrights. Wilson's "The Fifth of July," "Talley's Folly," and, most recently, "Burn This," have all enjoyed successful Broadway runs.

Although tonight's show will open hundreds of miles from the streets of Manhattan Island, K-State's version of "Angels Fall" is the result of Broadway-caliber preparation. This production is summed up by actor Geoffrey Kaufman in one word — "Good."

Kaufman, graduate student in theater, plays Niles Harris, an Ivy League art professor. Niles is one of six characters trapped by circumstance in the basement of a small adobe mission in Northwestern New Mexico.

The characters range from a pro tennis player to the elderly priest who runs the Indian mission. This motley group seeks shelter in the church after an accident at a nearby uranium mine closes surrounding roads.

Inside the mission, members of the group contemplate the contradictions of their respective worlds.

Kaufman appreciates Wilson's ability to create six realistic people in somewhat unrealistic circumstances.

"These characters are very real. There is not a hoaky one in the bunch," Kaufman said. "Wilson shows us that sometimes there are no happy resolutions. This is a story about how people deal with their crises."

However, "Angels Fall" is not just a look at the serious side of our world. Wilson does an admirable job of mixing in humor and irony. The result is style drama critic Janet Karsten Larson describes as "comedie humaine"— the comedy of life.

In 1988, the K-State Players' season has been packed full of quality performances and Nichols Hall has been sold out. "Angels Fall" promises to be another entertaining evening of theater.

There is limited seating for "Angels Fall" and reservations are recommended. The box office is open from noon to 5 p.m. Monday through Friday in Nichols Hall, 532-6398. Tickets are $4 for students and $6 for adults.

Walters

under then-CIA Director George Bush. During his tenure, Walters attempted to organize mercenary support for the CIA's covert war in Angola. Although unsuccessful in Brazil, Walters did recruit several French mercenaries.

In his book, "In Search of Enemies," former CIA Station Chief in Angola John Stockwell writes, "General Walters ... felt sure he could influence the Brazilian military command to help us recruit. Walters had served as defense and army attache in Brazil in the mid 1960s and was still somewhat euphoric about that experience."

Between 1976 and 1981, Walters officially left military service but remained active in various diplomatic roles. In 1980, for example, Walters traveled to Morocco as a representative of Environmental Energy Systems Inc. of Alexandria, Virginia. The firm, which manufactures military hardware, hired Walters in an effort to sell tanks to the King of Morocco.

A year later, Walters traveled to Guatemala as a "goodwill ambassador" for the Reagan administration. At the time of his visit, Walters also represented Basic Resources International, a firm seeking permission to export more oil from Guatemala.

According to the book "The Iran Contra Connection" by Jonathon Marshall, Peter Dale Scott and Jane Hunter, the Guatemalan regime granted the BRISA oil request, and, one month later, U.S. military aid to Guatemala resumed at a significant level.

Upon returning to the United States, Walters defended the Reagan policy of "quiet diplomacy" in Guatemala by noting that the armed forces were "not killing as many people as they did before."

With the election of Reagan, Walters returned to government service as ambassador at large for the Department of State until 1985, when Reagan appointed him U.N. ambassador. During this period, Walters was part of the administration's core Central America policy group — referred to informally by administration officials as "the Murder Board."

As a member, Walters was instrumental in organizing the Contras from the remnants of deposed Nicaraguan dictator Anastasio Somozoa's National Guard.

According to "The Iran Contra Connection," Walters used old connections to the military junta in Argentina to secure support and training for the Contras. This support came from 100 military officers who had participated in Argentina's "Dirty War" in the mid-1970s.

The "Dirty War" included widespread assassinations of civilians and opposition leaders by the Argentine military.

According to "The Iran Contra Connection," Walters, along with then-CIA Director William Casey, was also a key player in continuing support for the Contras in the face of Congressional restrictions.

"During the years Congress limited funding for the Contras, ... Casey and ... Walters traveled to a number of U.S. clients and urged contributions. Both Israel and Egypt donated money in response to the pleas 'when reminded of the substantial U.S. aid they receive.'"

Writing for the New Republic in September 1985, foreign affairs specialist Michael Massing claims that, as ambassador at large, Walters was instrumental in renewing U.S. military aid to several Latin American nations which had been denied aid by President Jimmy Carter for human rights violations.

basement home of one of McIntyre's campaign staff, waiting to hear election results.

After receiving a call from the elections committee informing him of his loss, McIntyre kept the news to himself until the rest of his supporters arrived.

"We're not satisfied," Lampe said.

"Cuffy was the only candidate who stood for all the students," Bolden said. "He went out and talked to the students. He asked them about the issues, and he won."

Andre Gray, junior in architecture, said Cuffy's campaign was organized and had direction. Gray said Cuffy uses a consistent priority list to solve problems and keep students in contact with each other and with the administration.

"I feel for John. I imagine he is upset," Cuffy said. "But I think my strategy was more effective. I got the votes."

McIntyre said he did not contest Cuffy's alleged violations before the runoff because he felt it would look as if he was trying to avoid running against him.

"We have asked John (McIntyre) to file his complaint by 5 p.m. Friday," Routson said. "We'll try to get elections committee together on Monday.

"When we set up a hearing, we have to give sufficient notice to the respondent (Cuffy) to study the complaint and prepare his defense."

McIntyre said he had been concerned that students supporting him would take it for granted that he would win since his margin was so large over Cuffy in the general election.

"A lot of people told me they wanted to vote for me but they forgot their fee card (and) took it for granted that I would win," he said.

Elections committee would try to be as fair as possible when considering the complaint, Routson said.

difficulties of designing the forms, getting the materials together, getting approval from the right places and actually carrying the things out."

In addition to individual and group projects, the workshop included field trips, lectures by visiting professional artists and architects, slides and dialogues, Vogt said.

Vogt said the class was not limited to K-State students and it had several students from different parts of the country.

Since the materials for such projects can be expensive, the workshop was funded partially by the Educational Facilities Laboratory of the Ford Foundation and partially by the University, Vogt said.

commitment from Midwest (Okla.) High School product Jeff Webster, a 6-foot-8 forward who is ranked as the No. 4 prospect at his position in the nation. But Tuesday, Webster had a press conference and orally committed to Oklahoma, apparently because he liked the Sooners' style of play and he wanted to stay close to home.

So Moylan remained the only good news for K-State basketball on Wednesday. The soon-to-be Lady Cat averaged more than 20 points a game during her first three seasons at St. Mary's, where, as a junior, she earned honorable mention All-American honors from USA Today and first-team All-State honors from the Topeka Capital-Journal.
